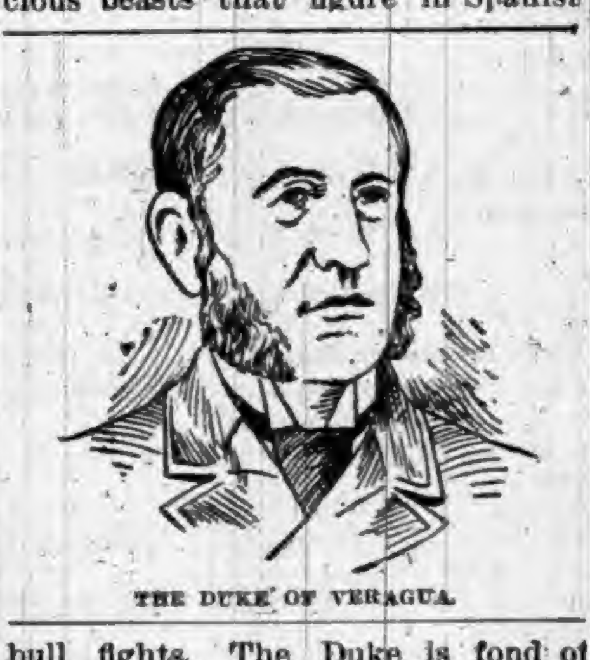
Is the Lineal Descendant of Discoverer Christofaro Columbo.

The Duke of Veragua, whom this country invited to be its guest at the inauguration ceremonies of the World's Fair Columbian Exhibition at Chicago, is the thirteenth in descent from Christopher Columbus, and therefore is it most fitting that he should be present at an event the celebration of which his ancestor made possible.

The full name of the Duke is Don Christobel Colon de Toledo de la Cerda y Gante, Duke of Veragua, Marquis of Jamaica and Adelantado Mayor of the Indies. The gentleman is more pleasant than his name. He is noted for his vigorous personality and is a statesman whose views carry considerable weight in the Liberal councils of Spain. He was born in Madrid in 1837, studied law and was admitted to practice. He early affiliated with the Liberal party and in 1871 was elected to the Cortes. In 1876 he again was elected and two years later was appointed Senator. When the Liberal party came into power he received the portfolio of Minister of the Interior. The Duke is an authority on cattle breeding and agricultural improvements. He raises the famous Veragua bulls—the ferocious beasts that figure in Spanish bull fights. The Duke is fond of country life and cares little for society.



THE DUKE OF VERAGUA.

What the Red Squirrel Knows.

Few boys know as much about the hickory-nut as the common red, or Hudson Bay, squirrel knows. It supplies him with his favorite food both winter and summer, and for that reason, probably, he has given it close attention and knows its peculiarities as well as a scientist. In the autumn, when the nutting season begins, the squirrel prepares for his harvest, and like a good husbandman has both a barn and granary. His barn is a well-decayed log, with plenty of rotting leaves lying about it, and his granary a dry hollow in a tree.

When the proper time comes, he climbs the well-loaded shell-bark hickory, and begins to throw down the nuts by biting the twig to which each is attached. This slight shock is sufficient, when the nut is ripe, to send them rattling through the withering leaves to the ground. In an hour an industrious squirrel will shake down enough to keep himself busy for the remainder of the day. And when at work few animals are as industrious as the red squirrel.

As he runs out one branch after another and strips it of its nuts, he is very much in earnest, for his winter supply of provisions depends on his activity.

His next task is to carry the nuts to his barn, where he buries them among the leaves and under the decaying wood. This is done so that the moisture and warmth will cause the thick outer husks to split and fall off.

When they have been buried for a week or ten days, it is found that each husk has split into four parts, which fall off as soon as the nut is moved. This process also enables the little harvester to separate the good nuts from the bad, as the husks on the wormy ones refuse to be loosened. The result is that the nuts he carries to his granary are all round and edible.

In the summer time his choicest food is the top root of the hickory seedling. The shell-bark hickory tree —as any one who has ever removed a stump knows—sends down into the earth, often to a considerable depth, a straight central root. When the seedling is but a few months old, and consists only of a twig and a few leaves, this root is quite soft and very sweet. This the squirrel knows, and it is his delight to dig up and eat the dainty morsels.

Considering the squirrel's fondness for both the nuts and the roots of the seedling, it is a wonder that the shell-bark hickory has not been exterminated.

As everybody is learning now, boiling kills the microbes in water, and it was only when the authority of a law forbidding the use of the infected river water was put in force in Hamburg last autumn that the cholera was really checked; and it is interesting to learn that Cyrus, who seems to have had good ideas of sanitation, when crossing the river Choaspes, had all the drinking water for his army boiled—in silver bowls, the legend says.

The first steam vessel which sailed on the Mississippi was in 1810, and the enterprise was considered extraordinary. In 1826, the steam navigation of the Mississippi had so improved in respect to facility and quickness, that fifty-one boats, of 28,916 tons, were employed.

A Occupation for Pretty Women.

The most curious occupation we have heard of lately, is that of a young woman who earns her bread and butter by being photographed. Latterly, there has been a demand for fashion pictures which look life-like, and women with pretty faces are beginning to be appealed to to lend their features and their figures for the purpose. The professional fashion model will be an institution shortly. The young girl spoken of is already in the field. She poses on a divan as carefully as for an Academy picture, to bring out her own best points and those of an evening gown. She plays tennis, she poises on an alpenstock. Fashion illustrations have lagged so far behind other pictures that it has been ruin to a wood-engraver who aspired to anything better than to work on them. The standard is now going to be raised.

The Mother-in-Law.

The mother-in-law appears to be a source of unfailing amusement to the Frenchman. Read this extract from a Parisian publication:—

"Two friends met after a separation of several years.

"'You are married?' asks one.

"'Yes, I sent you cards.'

"'How's your mother-in-law?'

"'An admirable woman—a heart of gold. I never heard of one like her.'

"'You speak sarcastically.'

"'Not at all.'

"'What do you mean, then?'

"'I never knew her. The poor woman was dead when I married her daughter.'"

Insect Life.

Insects do not breathe through the nose and mouth. Down the body run two main pipes. These pipes send out branches to the right and left like a network, extending to the extremities of the body, even to the ends of the antennæ and to the claws. Each main tube receives the external air through nine or ten spiracles or breathing holes, placed at intervals along the sides of the body. The spiracles are made water-tight and dust-tight by a strong fringe of hair which completely guards the entrance.

Carbonized Pepper.

A Western company manufacturing graphite paint tells us of a recent inquiry for a price on a large amount of graphite. It is not the custom of the concern to sell its raw material, and an investigation was made as to the use to which the graphite was to be put. The inquiry was found to proceed from a company having a close business connection with a jobbing house that does a large business in black pepper. The era of sanded sugar and chicoried coffee has evidently given place to the day of carbonized pepper.—Iron Trade Review.

Sylvester Night.

Sylvester Night, as the night preceding New Year's Day is called in Germany, is an occasion for family gatherings and rejoicings. The evening hours before the clock strikes midnight are devoted to a musical family entertainment, which is followed by the brewing of the New Year's punch, while the cakes are placed on the table. With the first stroke of the midnight hour glasses are clashed together and good wishes for the coming year exchanged.

Prelates of Humble Origin.

The present archbishop of Cologne is the son of a butcher. The father of his predecessor, Cardinal Geissel, was a vintager, and his mother was a washerwoman. The archbishop of Posen is the son of a shoemaker. The prince bishop of Breslau comes of a family of weavers. The bishops of Strasburg and Muenster were poor peasant boys, and the archbishop of Olmutz is the son of a tenant farmer.—New York Tribune.

Generous Boy.

The Philadelphia Press says that a teacher was giving her pupils a lesson on liberality, when one of them said:

"When I have a box of candy I always give everybody in the house a piece; but I like to give mamma her piece more than the rest."

"Why is that, Johnny?"

"Because she always thanks me, and hands it back."

Some people do nothing but talk encouragingly.

Carbonic Acid Preserves Milk.

Microbes and carbonic acid do not seem to be particularly incompatible, to use a pharmaceutical expression, but they do not get along together any too well. Thus, Nourry and Michel find that ordinary milk, which becomes curdled in forty-eight hours at the outside, suffers no change until the expiration of eight days if it be saturated with carbonic acid under pressure. If the raise of temperature to 45 degrees to 80 degrees is made the curds form as usual, while at a temperature of 120 degrees they are formed at once without any interval. Hence the use does not seem to exert a microbicide action in the ordinary sense of the term, but it checks the development of the micro-organisms.

The pleasant effect and perfect safety with which ladies may use the California liquid laxative, Syrup of Figs, under all conditions, makes it their favorite remedy. To get the true and genuine article, look for the name of the California Fig Syrup Co., printed near the bottom of the package.

"German Syrup"

My niece, Emeline Hawley, was taken with spitting blood, and she became very much alarmed, fearing that dreaded disease, Consumption. She tried nearly all kinds of medicine but nothing did her any good. Finally she took German Syrup and she told me it did her more good than anything she ever tried. After Effects Cured.

Mr. Bilger writes:—"I had a bad attack of the Grippe; after a time caught cold and had a second attack, it settled in my kidneys and liver, and Oh! such pain and misery in my back and legs. The physicians' medicine and other things that I used made no impression, and I continually grew worse until I was a physical wreck, and given up to die. Father bought me a bottle of Dr. Kilmer's SWAMP ROOT, and before I had used all of the second bottle I felt better, and to-day I am just as well as ever. A Sad Death.

Can you describe anything worse than a young person dying by inches with consumption, cut off in the bloom of youth, when bright prospects of happiness and prosperity are before them, a very sad death indeed. Is it not a fact that most cases of this kind are brought on by a cough, only slight at first, then more violent, followed by night sweats and a general breaking down of the entire system. These are cases in which people are to blame. Why not check this slight cough. Dr. Marshall's Lung Syrup is guaranteed to cure, it will prevent consumption. Use it before it is too late. Don't Travel Without It.

Dr. M. J. Davis is a prominent physician of Lewis, Cass county, Iowa, and has been actively engaged in the practice of medicine at that place for the past thirty-five years. On the 26th of May, while in Des Moines en route for Chicago, he was suddenly taken with an attack of diarrhœa. Having sold Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhœa Remedy for the past seventeen years, and knowing its reliability, he procured a 25 cent bottle, two doses of which completely cured him. The excitement and change of water and diet incident to traveling often produce a diarrhœa. Everyone should procure a bottle of this Remedy before leaving home. For sale by Robbins & McCord.

HONDURAS LETTER.

PORT BURCHARD, HONDURAS,
May 15, '93

EDITOR COURIER:

Perhaps a few items in regard to turtle catching might be of interest to your readers, for turtle soup is a dish that but few of the Hoosier epicures have ever sampled. Some over one hundred vessels are constantly engaged in catching the famous Green Sea turtle in this Carribean Sea, which is considered the best turtle ground known. To the eastward of Cape Gracios a Dios lie the thousand small tropic isles to which the turtle vessels resort to make their best catches, although Green and Hawksbill turtles are found on all the tropic coasts. The turtles are caught in this way: When darkness has spread her obscuring mantle over the lonely sea, it is then the huge reptile ventures upon the sandy sea shore to deposit her eggs in a deep hole which they cunningly dig high upon the beach into which they often lay from one hundred to three hundred eggs. Carefully covering all with the fine white sand they retreat quickly to their watery home. The whole time spent on land does not often exceed fifteen minutes. The turtle hunters scatter out about one half mile apart and walk the beach near the water until the break of day. Every turtle seen upon the shore is turned over on their backs where they are obliged to lie until the day crew gathers them in, which is done by tying a strong cord to their front fluke and leading them to pens prepared for them. These pens consist of piles driven into the shoal waters of some sheltered spot where the catch is stored until sufficient quantity is caught to load a vessel, when they are shipped to New York, London and all the great cities of the world. Last Saturday night two Florida men, one creole and myself, went on a hunt for these monsters of the deep. We succeeded in turning five of the huge creatures all of which would weigh from 250 to 300 pounds, making a good lift for two men to turn one over. In the early morning we led them to town and slaughtered them getting about two and a half barrels of pure meat from the five. It is a queer sort of game, but a very valuable addition to our larder. When I return home I shall bring with me a shell of the one I turned over myself as a trophy of my first turtle hunt in the tropic lands. I will bring other curios which I shall be glad to show to your readers.

Some Reminiscences of its Early Days and Pioneer Citizens.

1871—Continued.

In the way of private dwellings, material for building was accumulated in various localities.

Dr. J. A. Cowan a man of fine taste, an excellent physician, and an enthusiastic citizen entered heartily into the spirit of the times. He prepared material for a brick building which he expected to have ready for occupancy by fall and T. B. Totten who had come to town and engaged in business as a grocer, put up a brick dwelling in the western part of town.

Dr. Cowan succeeded McFarland as the owner of the Wheelock house; planted grapes and shrubbery, plants and flowers beautifying the grounds and rendering them very attractive. He died here in 1885 and his daughters are well known as popular and successful milliners.

T. B. Totten had married Hannah Davis sister to John L. Davis, and had served with credit through the war in the ranks of the 44th Ind After some years he emigrated west and settled near Hutchinson, Kansas where he now lives.

Early in April, a number of improvements had been consummated. Azam Foltz in the north end had finished a neat one and a half story framed dwelling and next to him John Otto ex-artilleryman was snugly located in a two-story house. Enos Kuhlman had finished a home like Otto's and further south C. Snell had built a frame dwelling while R. Burniston had moved into his two stoay residence.

In the south end Henry Wartensleben had built opposite Fred Boeringer. Westward; J. Ashley had added a dwelling and shop on Jackson street and J. Walborn, George Gerstensleger, Jules Beuret and John W. Rickel occupied new and substantial buildings.

Among other buildings erected or contemplated were those of F. D. Ryan, I. M. Thomas, Wm. Williams, M. Huston, H. C. Peterson, Mrs. Mott, J. B. Lobmiller, A. J. Little S. B. Ward, G. R. Hoffman, L. Hobnick, Sol. Shearer, John Gross, J. L. Davis and Guy Plumb, besides material improvement of property by some thirty others. It will be seen from this showing that the revival of interest originated and was carried forward largely by the townspeople themselves.

The demand for lots became spirited and holders of tracts of land within and adjoining the corporation contemplated platting them to meet the growing wants of the town. Gilbert McFarland had traded property in Ohio to A. Wheelock for his five-acre tract near the Saginaw depot and this he had laid out in lots under the name of McFarland's Addition which the town board formally annexed. Gross and Dills laid out their addition just east of the present Lake Shore freight house and before fall had put some twenty-five lots on the market; and George Kuhlman, an ex-auditor had platted twenty acres situated in the northwest part of town and soon half of these lots had been sold. These lots are large and from their elevated position command a view of the whole town and constituted beautiful sites for residence occupancy. These advantages attracted purchasers and this locality was speedily occupied and improved.

As a summary of definite gain for the year 1871, it was found that the population had increased from 677 to 976, and full fifty-four houses and additions besides business stands, had been built.

Previously existing business changed to suit exigencies and new aspirants for public favor came into notice. Joseph Rainier of the Rainier House carrying on also, a livery stable, catered to the needs of the traveler and brought custom to his house by ordering at a cost of $800, a fine omnibus, the first and only one in DeKalb county. It arrived in August and was put to use, meeting trains at the depot. Though intent upon keeping to the front in those days, Mr. Rainier found the streets ill-conditioned for such an omnibus and before long sold at slight loss to a city purchaser.

A. Freeman was host of the Main street Exchange and the Weaver House kept by S. C. Swineford, soon gained great popularity for its savory and substantial fare, its tidy, clean rooms and the genial treatment to all guests so that the hotel soon became widely known as a first-class institution. It was truthfully said at the time, that much of this excellent reputation was owing to the tact and culinary skill of the landlady who had few superiors in this direction.

The woolen mill with abundant capital in the control of its owners, to buy all the wool, it would require during the year, was in continuous operation.

The company was in the market and the manager paid forty to forty-five cents per pound for fleeces. Samuel Lanferty merchant and grain buyer entered this field as a wool buyer and coming into competetion with Thomas D. Gross, the price was advanced to half a dollar per pound and farmers were attracted to bring in their season's clip at a good steady rate.

The steam flouring mill owned by C. C. Buss & Co. was bought by Whedon W. Griswold, ex-auditor, and the name changed from "Union" to "Eagle Mills." It was the intention of the new owner to manufacture on a large scale for shipments elsewhere.

Isaac M. Thomas, township trustee, dealer in lumber, lime, etc. was also grain buyer at the depot to the extent of as high as 1500 bushels of wheat in a day, and when, leaving out the purchases of the local millers it was learned that between July 1st. 1871 and Jan. 1st, 1872, there had been shipped from Auburn 251 car loads of grain, the importance of this new market began to be appreciated. The statement proved a surprise gratifying to the citizen as it was a convenient home market to the farmers.

The shipment of wheat reached 58,000 bushels; of oats, 40,000; of corn, 18,000. Add to these grains, the large quantity of clover and flax seed, barley and other produce and the amount falling little short of 125 000 bushels in six months was the extent of the Auburn grain market during the first year of the railroad.

Chicago, the Fair and the Fire.

One of the most remarkable facts noticeable among the great influx of visitors to the fair is their keen interest in the great city, her past history and present city, her past history and present wonderful growth, and the marvelous rebuilding that has taken place since Chicago was swept away by the flames of the fire of 1871. This is nowhere more manifest than at the Cyclorama of the Chicago Fire, Michigan Avenue and Madison street, where the beautiful effects that the artists have secured in painting the great conflagration are like nothing ever yet shown in cycloramic work;—the burning embers, hurled through the air by the hurricane that was blowing on that memorable October day, the toppling walls, portions of which are shown in mid air, blown there by an explosion of giant powder, clouds of ruddy hue, tinted by the flames, the shadows of which are dancing on the doomed buildings—all so realistic as to be startling in their effect, and one can almost imagine the work of destruction to be at the moment going on. The visitor to Chicago will find this one of the most exhibitions in the city.

These figures represent the number of bottles of Dr. King's New Discovery, for consumption, coughs and colds, which were sold in the United States, from March '91 to March '92. Two million, two hundred and twenty-eight thousand, six hundred and seventy-two bottles sold in one year, and each and every bottle was sold on a positive guarantee that money would be refunded if satisfactory results did not follow its use. The secret of its success is plain. It never disappoints and can always be depended on as the very best remedy for coughs, cold, etc. Price 50c. and $1.00. At Robbins & McCord's drugstore. 6

Communicated.

WATERLOO, IND, June 22, 1893.

EDITOR COURIER: I would like space enough in your paper to deny the assertion of Mr. Willis in the last issue of the Waterloo Press, that the town board appointed me health officer for Waterloo because I owed the town delinquent taxes, I would say that it is entirely false, and Mr. Willis has no authority for making such assertion. I made application to the board for the appointment, which they promised me. The salary was $15 a year, fixed as the law requires, by the town board. Another man heard that I had made application for the office and put in a bid for $12, which made it the duty of the board to cut down the salary. I then agreed to fill the place for $11, and under the circumstances, would have done it for nothing.

Resp. Yours,
DR. J. W. HUGHES.

HISTORY OF A WEEK.

PEOPLE, PLACES, AND THINGS OF THE WORLD.

Disastrous Fire at Union City, Ind.—An Ohio Tragedy—A Mother's Terrible Crime—Another Crossing Horror at Chicago—Crop Prospects.

Disastrous Blaze at Union City.

Fire swept away one block of the central portion of Union City, Ind. The blaze started in the livery barn of Adolph Adams and had gotten away beyond control before the local fire department, a voluntary organization, got in working trim. The losses are: Pythian Opera House, a beautiful structure built three years ago, $31,000; Ross & Harney, Carriage Company, $15,000; Charles Prior, livery barn, $5,000; Adolph Adams, livery barn, $5,000; Webb Lambert, harness store, $4,000; J. N. Wallace, saloon, $2,500; Wm. Wright, furniture store, $7,000; Anderson Bros., blacksmith shop, $1,000. Across the street the Big Four train dispatcher's office and a number of frame buildings were destroyed. The K. of P. lodge lost everything, and there was considerable loss to the Catholic Church, which was holding a fair in the Opera House.

Crop Prospects.

Indiana—Large crops of clover, nearly all saved; wheat harvest commenced; corn and other crops, except fruit, in good condition.

Ohio—Showers have advanced the growth of corn; tobacco and grass in fine condition; clover, barley, and wheat harvest progressing; wheat well filled and good quality; rye ready to harvest; tobacco plants all set; general wheat harvest in progress in the South.

Michigan—The general condition of all crops is fully up to the standard. Wheat, oats, corn, and rye improved, haying begun; some wheat soon ready to cut.

The Pardoned Anarchists.

John Mark's anarchist paper, New York Freiheite, is editorially rampant. It demands that Judge Gray, Attorney Grinnell and Chief Bonfield be hung. Here is a choice morsel addressed to the pardoned criminals: "We greet them as soldiers returning to our ranks, ready to again unsheath the sword against church, State, capital, and in aid of anarchy, communism, and social revolution. Unfurl your blood-red banners, comrades, the world over, let us celebrate this jubilation, for we have received powerful re-enforcements to our army. The fight and victory shall be ours."

A Crossing Horror.

Chicago special: While Mrs. Inholson, her two children, and another child were attempting to cross the Millard avenue crossing in a buggy, an incoming milk train on the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy road struck the buggy and completely demolished it, killing two children, badly injuring their mother, and fatally wounding the remaining child. The dead children and the two injured persons were taken to the home of the Inholson's. The gateman at the Millard avenue crossing, James Webster, was arrested and locked up at the Lawn Gate police station.

An Ohio Tragedy.

A terrible tragedy was enacted a few miles west of Ottawa, Ohio, in which a husband, in a fit of frenzy, shot his wife and then fired a fatal shot into his own brain, dying almost instantly. Jacob L. Lyons and his family lived in a comfortable home in Greensburg Township. Being of a very nervous temperament Lyons was easily excited. The other evening he and his wife had a dispute over a trivial matter. He flew into a passion and shot her, then turned the gun upon himself. His wife is still alive, but it is thought she will not recover. They leave a small family.

Bold Mexican Bandits.

Durango (Mexico) special: J. H. Todd, a prominent American contractor of this city, while taking a morning ride, accompanied by Miss Laura Moore, was stopped by five bandits on the edge of the city. Miss Moore attempted to escape, but was overtaken. Mr. Todd was severely beaten over the head and robbed of his horse and a considerable sum of money. Miss Moore was also robbed of her horse and valuable jewelry. A force of men at once started in pursuit, but up to the present none of the outlaws have been captured.

Terrible Crime.

City of Mexico special: A woman named Anita Sanches has been arrested at Piedra Groda, charged with a terrible crime. She became angry at her 8-year-old daughter and forced her into a large baker's oven. The inhuman woman then lighted a fire and the child was slowly roasted to death. She confessed having committed the crime and will receive a life sentence, as the law does not provide the death penalty.

Burned to Death.

Fire destroyed George McCoy & Co.'s elevator at Cincinnati. The elevator stables burned and Bennie Brittman, a coal driver, was burned with them. Property loss small.

A Town and Three People Burned.

The village of Lexington, fifty miles south of Guthrie, O. T., was destroyed by fire. Three people perished in the flames.

Cholera Prospects.

Dr. Metcalf, Secretary of the Indiana Board of Health, is keeping a very close eye upon the ravages of cholera in Europe. A circular issued by the government is received every week, showing just where the disease is prevailing on the continent.

"The prospect of escaping the plague," said the Secretary of the board "is now very good. But I do not like the way that small-pox has crept into the State. If this disease can get into our ports so easily, it will not be hard for cholera to get a foothold. Perhaps the disinfection is not so thorough from ports not known to have cholera, but whether cholera breaks out or not in this country, Indiana is pretty well able to take care of itself. Our board believes we have plans that will, with the money on hand, be effective in keeping the plague out of the State.

DEATH IN THE RUINS.

Collapse of the Tremont House at Fort Scott.

Fort Scott,)Kan.) special: The Tremont House collapsed without a moment's warning. Seventy-five people were buried in the ruins.

The unfortunate victims of the catastrophy were caught like rats in a trap. There were no indications of structural weakness in the hotel, which was one of the best buildings in the city. It was a solid-looking, four-story brick on one of the main thoroughfares. Beneath it were some of the principal retail stores. There was no hint of the impending danger. Most of the guests of the hotel were out through the city. Only the help of various kinds and a few of the boarders were within. The stores, however, were filled with people—mostly women and children. Many of these were from the surrounding country. Suddenly the walls of the building began to waver and totter and then they fell. The walls seemed to first spread apart so that the floor joists were drawn out of the brick walls. The three upper floors fell upon top of one another, carrying their contents down with them. For a moment the shaking walls stood tottering and then they, too, plunged in and down, burying the ruined floors beneath an enormous mass of brick and mortar and shattered frame work.

At the first cracking noise of the parting timbers the people in the hotel and in the stores sought safety by flight. Those nearest the entrances, doors, and windows made good their escape, some of them missing but by an inch being caught by the tumbling masonry. For those who were in the middle parts of the stores and for the servants at work in the rooms of the hotel escape was impossible. They went down with it and were crushed beneath the ruins.

The horror of the thing seemed to daze and paralyze the people for a moment. Then the work of rescuing the living and recovering the bodies of the dead was begun. Under the command of the Mayor and the Chief of Police the citizens went to work. The fire and police departments did all in their power to hasten the work. It was feared at one time that the ruins would take fire, and those entombed, but still alive, would perish in the flames, but the fire department soon extinguished the slight flames that curled up where the hotel kitchen had been. Loss of Life will reach between thirty-five and forty.

MAD FLAMES.

Leipsic, Ohio, Almost Swept from Existence.

Leipsic (Ohio) special: A most destructive fire broke out in the rear of Gerdeman's saloon, on Main street. The flames quickly reached the tailor shop of Stechschultes, and shoe store of Shweitzer & Parlette, and, extending upward, compelled Mrs. Foultz, living up-stairs, to remove her household goods. The fire reached Case's flour and feed store and Edwards Bros.' hardware establishment. Here a quanty of gunpowder was stored. The fire raged with rapidity, and fears were entertained for the brick buildings on the opposite side of the street.

An explosion startled the bystanders, telling them that the flames had reached the room where the powder was stored. Crash went window after window, and the sound of the glass reechoed through the street, the efforts of the men at the dilapidated hand engine were useless.

The Mayor of Deshler was wired for assistance. The work of destruction continued, and the drug store and privote residence of Dr. Limmermann next fell before the devouring element. A response soon came from Deshler, and in a short time the whistle of an engine was heard carrying the department with their steamer, hose carriages and ladder truck on board flat cars.

The Deshler boys soon had the fire under control. The loss is estimated at about $75,000, partially covered by insurance. The efforts of the Deshler Fire Department are fully appreciated by the citizens, and but for the tardiness of a railroad employe, the boys would have reached here quicker.

ANARCHISTS PARDONED.

Fielden, Neebe, and Schwab are Restored to Their Families.

Springfield (Ill.) special: Gov. Altgeld has pardoned Fielden, Schwab, and Neebe. Banker Dreyer was here the other day and it is supposed his influence was decisive. It was not even known that the case was being considered by the Governor. Altgeld's action has created great surprise here, and it will doubtless cause a profound sensation in Chicago.

The Governor has prepared a long statement in which he criticizes Gary and Bonfield severely.

Chicago special: The anarchists arrived in this city on the Santa Fe road. Quite a crowd had gathered at the Dearborn station to witness the arrival. The three men and Mr. Dreyer left the train at Twenty-third street to avoid a demonstration and went quietly to their homes. On the way from Joliet the three men promised Mr. Dreyer to eschew anarchy forever. Schwab expressed the sentiment that next to freedom the most desirable thing was security, and the other men agreed with him. At their homes they were greeted by a few of their friends, who congratulated them on their return. The men were overjoyed at regaining their freedom. The meeting of the men with their families was touching.

MINE DISASTER.

An Explosion Occurs in a Pennsylvania Shaft.

Wilkesbarre (Pa.) special: While eight men were at work at Manticoke in No. 6 gangway, of No. 9 slope of the Susquehanna Coal Company, about three-fourths miles from the bottom of the shaft, a terrific explosion of gas took place which hurled the victims off their feet and scattered them in all directions, killing four men and a boy instantly, and seriously but not fatally injuring three more. The dead are:

Abram Walker, miner, married; leaves five children.

Frank Beanick, 14 years old, door boy; died after reaching home.

John Smith, miner, married; leaves three children.

William Shortz, laborer, burned to a crisp.

Polander, whose name could not be learned, nor could his body be recognized.

The injured are: John Gwent, horribly burned about the head and arms, in serious condition; two Polanders, names unknown, badly burned on hands and face.

Seven Fire-Works Men Mangled.

An explosion in Pain's fire-works amphitheater at Manhattan Beach, New York, injured seven men. Joseph Purcell of Brooklyn, had his face partly blown off and his arms and legs badly bruised and burned. He will probably die. James Egan, Henry Henderson, Joseph Lawler, Frank, Ben, and Sydney Hamm, all of Sheepshead Village, were bruised and burned about the face and body. Purcell, Henderson, and Lawler were loading an iron bomb with an explosive paste, when the bomb exploded, blowing Purcell into the street, nearly a rod away. Henderson and Lawler were blown some distance.

SEND IN YOUR NAME

If You Want Quarters Reserved at the G. A. R. Encampment.

Indianapolis special: Estimates sent by assistant adjutant generals of different departments to the executive directors of the twenty-seventh National Encampment of the Grand Army, to be held in Indianapolis, in September, indicate the attendance will be 40 per cent. larger than ever before. This is largely due to the fact that the encampment is to be held at the center of the Grand Army membership and will also bring them close to the World's Fair. The work of providing accommodations is specially under the supervision of the executive director to whom applications for quarters in hotels and boarding houses as well as in barracks should be directed. In a general circular made public, all who desire to secure quarters are urged to send in applications immediately, and it is stated those who fail to do so very soon will have difficulty in making arrangements on account of the great rush.

Student Drowned.

Ada (Ohio) special: O. E. Taylor, a pharmacy student attending the Ohio Normal University, was drowned in a stone quarry near here while bathing. The water is very deep in the quarries, and his companions were unable to get him out, and sent to town for assistance. Several hundred students and citizens went out, and, after several hours' hard work; succeeded in rescuing the body. The sad news was telegraphed to his parents, who reside at New Hampshire, Ohio.

Republicans Elect Mayor in Milwaukee.

Milwaukee (Wis.) special: The special election for Mayor resulted in a victory for John C. Koch, the Republican candidate, who was elected by 3,500 majority. The vote was light, being less than 20,000 out of a registry list of nearly 50,000. There was nothing involved in the election, the result depending entirely on the personal popularity of the two candidates. This is the first Republican victory in the city for several years.

Will Shun Chicago.

The Board of Managers of the General Christian Missionary Society of the Christian Church has ordered the Corresponding Secretary to seek some other place than Chicago for the coming annual meeting and to do all in his power to secure the removal or closing of the exhibit of this Board in the Columbian Exposition and those of other departments.

Safe Robbery in Terre Haute.

Burglars performed an expert job on the safe of the Buckeye dry goods store at Terre Haute, Ind., and got $600 in cash. The police can find nothing to give them a clew. Of the money taken $125 belonged to a clerk employed in the store.

Deserter Shot.

Joseph A. Lucky, a recruit at the United States barracks at Columbus, Ohio, awaiting trial for attempted desertion, tried to escape again, and was shot and seriously wounded in the hip by one of the guards.

Struck by Lightning.

The 10-year-old son of Ernest Meissner of Caledona, Wis., was instantly killed by lightning in the doorway of the barn. The father and hired man who stood near by were made senseless, but will recover.

Ford's Theater Case.

Secretary Lamont has issued an order dissolving the military court of inquiry ordered in connection with Ford's Theater disaster, and will leave the civil authorities to deal with the case.

Blood Tel's.

The supreme court of Ohio, in the Deshler will case, decided that brothers and sisters of full blood inherited before half brothers or sisters. This added nearly a million dollars to the wealth of William G. Deshler.

Failed for Many Millions.

Goldsborough, Mort & Co., bankers and merchants in Melbourne, have suspended payment. Their liabilities are £2,500,000. They are expected to resume business shortly.

Drove Under a Tree.

George Craig, a young man employed on the Bell farm, four miles north of Parkersburg, W. Va., while plowing in a field was killed by lightning.

A Switchman Killed.

Herbert Leach, aged 28, a switchman employed in the C., H. & D yards at Wellston, Ohio, fell under a moving train and was instantly killed.

Train Robbers Foiled.

A plot to rob a Missouri Pacific train just west of Omaha was foiled by one of the men informing the police. Two arrests followed.

SIGHTS IN A BIG TOWN.

SOME PLACES OF INTEREST IN CHICAGO.

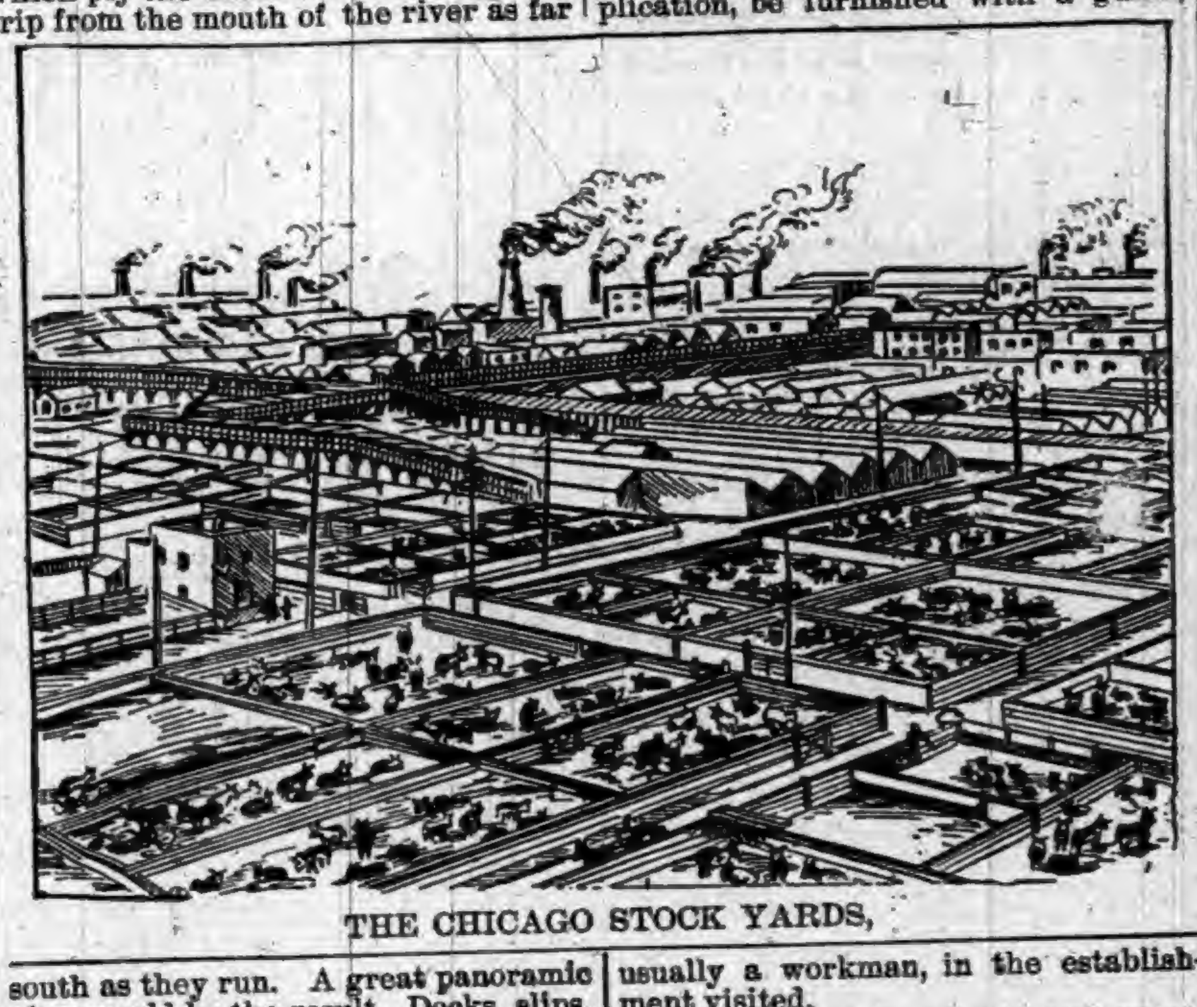
The Great Meat Packing Industry and How It Is Carried On at the Stock Yards—Lumber Yards Along the River—City Prison, Etc.

Garden City Gossip.

Chicago correspondence:

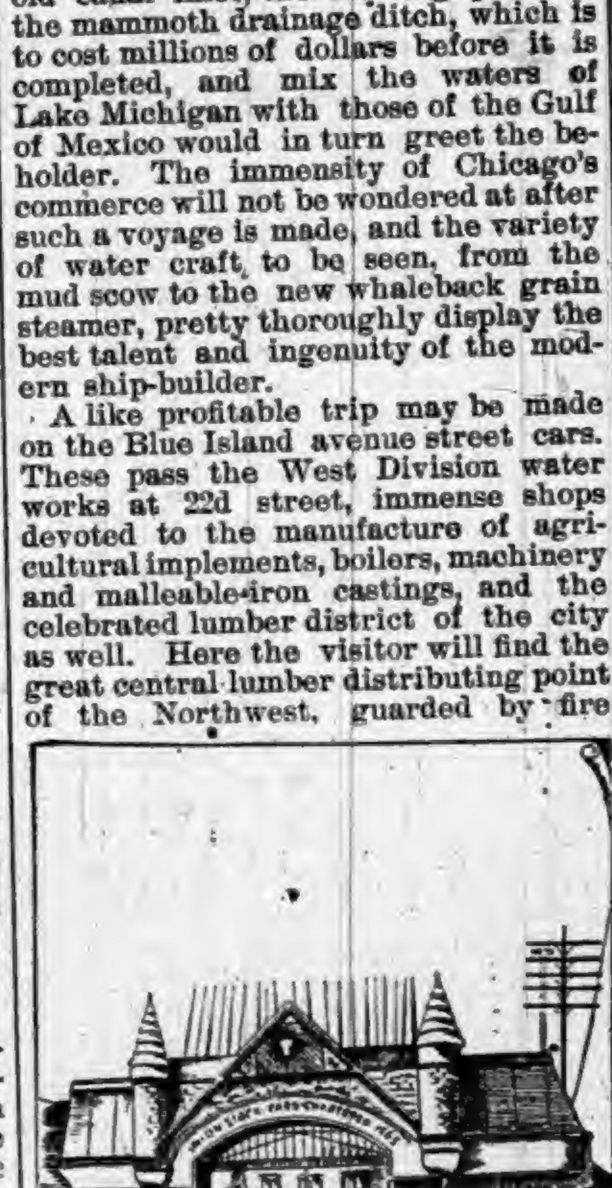
Southwest of the business center of Chicago lies a vast district given over mainly to industrial interests and to the homes of the humble artisan. There are no imposing mansions, few stretches of greenness, and the picturesque is not present, but the visitor determined to "do" the city thoroughly and well will be surprised at the amount of information to be gleaned and practical benefit derived from a glimpse of this section, which has a great bearing upon the social and commercial growth of the World's Fair metropolis.

The South branch of the Chicago River winds its way through the district in question, and influences its character to a large extent. It is not impossible for an energetic talker to prevail upon some of the owners or captains of the numerous tugboats which ply the stream to allow a free trip from the mouth of the river as far south as they run. A great panoramic view would be the result. Docks, slips, quarries, tanneries, brick yards, the extensive wood and coal wharves, the old canal inlet, the starting point of the mammoth drainage ditch, which is to cost millions of dollars before it is completed, and mix the waters of Lake Michigan with those of the Gulf of Mexico would in turn greet the beholder. The immensity of Chicago's commerce will not be wondered at after such a voyage is made, and the variety of water craft to be seen, from the mud scow to the new whaleback grain steamer, pretty thoroughly display the best talent and ingenuity of the modern ship-builder.



THE CHICAGO STOCK YARDS.

A like profitable trip may be made on the Blue Island avenue street cars. These pass the West Division water works at 22d street, immense shops devoted to the manufacture of agricultural implements, boilers, machinery and malleable-iron castings, and the celebrated lumber district of the city as well. Here the visitor will find the great central lumber distributing point of the Northwest, guarded by fire boats, covering miles and miles of river frontage, and giving employment to many thousands of laborers. Just beyond the terminus of the car line lies one of the model workhouses of the country—the city bridewell—the correctionary prison for the punishment of light crimes and misdemeanors. In system, cleanliness and interest this institution fairly rivals the noted State penitentiary at Joliet. Its cell houses are built on the very latest plans for perfect ventilation and general utility, and its workshops give occupation to a motley throng well worth studying as truly representative members of the unfortunate classes of society.



ENTRANCE TO THE STOCK YARDS.

The Stock Yards.

Another interesting point of importance is the Chicago Stock Yards. Thousands, almost millions, have come from all over the world to visit this center of the cattle industry, probably the largest and finest of its line in existence. They are accessible by way of the South Halsted street cars and the State street cable cars. Meat packing is the basis of Chicago's prosperity, for it is the oldest of all the city's industries, the first lot of cattle ever packed in the county being slaughtered in 1832. They numbered on that occasion some 250 head, and cost $2.75 per hundred weight; about 350 hogs, costing $3 per hundred weight, being slaughtered and packed at the same time. Forty-eight years later, the city received in twelve months no fewer than 7,059,355 live hogs, 1,382,477 cattle, and 335,810 sheep, since which time the proportions of the hog product of the country handled by Chicago have kept on increasing. In 1891 the estimated value of all cattle handled was over $239,000,000, while 278,044 barrels of pork, 362,109,199 pounds of lard and 57,189,677 pounds of wool were shipped away.

An inspection of these yards, which front on South Halsted street just beyond Thirty-ninth street, and which have so interested the gaze of the world-wide tourists, will strike the average beholder with wonder. They comprise a city in their area and envirnument, the enormous business done centering in some four hundred acres of ground. The yards are divided off into sections so as to include 3,300 pens, 1,800 of which are covered, provision thus being made to handle 25,000 head of cattle, 14,000 sheep, and 150,000 hogs at one time. They contain twenty miles of streets, twenty miles of water troughs, fifty miles of feed troughs, and seventy-five miles of water and drainage pipes. Five artesian wells, having an average depth of 1,230 feet, afford an ample supply of water. There are also eighty-seven miles of railroad tracks, all the great roads having access to this vast market. The entire cost of grounds and improvements was over four millions of dollars.

The meat packing industry is carried on in immediate proximity to the Stock Yards. The extent of this interest may be imagined from the fact that a single business controlled by one of the great packing firms of the city occupies seventy acres of floor space and employs 3,500 men. The Stock Yards are open to visitors at all times, but a person wishing to view the workings of the packing houses, can, on application, be furnished with a guide, usually a workman, in the establishment visited.

The traveller in remote and unsettled districts who purchases a wholesome and convenient can of prepared meat, the villager who receives daily a consignment of pork, beef, or mutton, fresh and refrigerated, have the great packing industry to thank for it all. It is possible to follow a cow or a hog from the pen into which it is driven at morning to the shapely loins of meat it forms a few hours later, by keeping it company and passing from section to section of the systematic handling it receives. The cattle are driven from the pens at the Stock Yards to the slaughtering houses. Here one swift blow dispatches the animal, and moving hooks catch it up, with scores of other carcasses following. It is cleaned, given a bath in a steam vat to remove bristles, quartered, its various portions sent to particular apartments, and then placed in the cooling houses. Equal care is taken in the shipment of the meat, clean refrigerator cars being used, which deposit Chicago beef, pork, or mutton in New York City within forty-eight hours after the cattle are received at the Chicago stock yards.

The man's screams were agonizing and penetrated to the court-room, causing excitement there.

SLAIN BY A CYCLONE.

FIFTEEN PERSONS PERISH IN A KANSAS TORNADO.

A Fearful Storm Sweeps Over a Section of Country in the Kansas River Valley—Many Killed, Some Fatally Hurt and Others Seriously Injured.

Work of a Windstorm.

One of the most destructive cyclones that ever visited Kansas swept over the section in the vicinity of Williamstown Wednesday night, completely devastating a strip of country about two miles east and west of the town, and killing instantly fifteen people. The storm was preceded by a heavy rain and its approach from the northwest was heralded by a sudden darkening of the skies and the terrible rush of the wind. In the path of its destruction nothing remained that could be at all recognized. Trees were twisted up; fields of grain were completely wiped out; hedges were completely stripped of foliage; stock was killed and horribly maimed, and houses and barns and all buildings were swept out of sight. The list of killed is as follows:

EVANS, L. F.
EVANS, EMERY.
GRIMES, L. M.
GRIMES, MARY, and two children.
HUTCHINSON, MRS. JOHN.
KINCAID, SAMUEL.
KINCAID, CLARA.
KINCAID, SADIE.
KINCAID, WALTER.
KINCAID, EVA.
KINCAID, WILLIAM.
PETERS, W. F.
STEWART, SAMUEL.

Three others were fatally hurt and a score more or less injured. The bodies of all those killed were shockingly mangled. Mrs. Hutchinson's arms and legs were found in a tree a mile from the house. Eva Kincaid's head was severed from her body. Samuel Stewart and L. M. Grimes were carried 300 hundred yards in different directions and mutilated almost beyond recognition. Stewart's body was cut in two as if by one stroke of a great knife. The strip of country swept by the cyclone is left as barren as a floor. In Williamstown schoolhouse were found the dead bodies of the Kincaid family, consisting of father, mother and four children. The youngest child is without its head, it being blown or cut off and carried away by the wind. One of the children was found three miles from the house. At Arthur Evans' farm, a quarter of a mile northeast of Williamstown, everything is destroyed. Evans ran into his basement, but was found dead three rods from the house in the field. Mrs. Evans also took shelter in the basement, but escaped with her life. At the Hutchinson farm, which was northeast of Williamstown, Mrs. Hutchinson lost her life and Mr. Hutchinson was slightly injured. Seven head of horses were killed here. Some of the horses were blown a quarter of a mile away. In the cemetery at Williamstown the monuments are all blown away and some of the base stones were blown many rods. Fully thirty horses were completely demolished and the little village of Williamstown wiped out of existence. The storm was only about six minutes in passing.

At Winfield many small houses were destroyed and a number of people injured, two fatally. The Episcopal Church is completely destroyed. The Babbitt Hotel and Thompson block, a three-story building, are badly damaged and the plate-glass front of the First National Bank was blown out. The west wing of the courthouse was also blown away.

Emporia also suffered from a windstorm but to a lesser degree.

FOUR HUNDRED LOST.

The British Battleship Victoria Is Sunk Off Tripoli.

A most terrible calamity befell the great British twin screw battleship Victoria, flying the flag of Vice Admiral George C. Tryon, K. C. B., commander of the Mediterranean station. She was sunk in eighteen fathoms of water off Tripoli Friday afternoon, and at least four hundred of her officers and crew went to the bottom with her. The disaster was due to the fearful bungling of either her own officers or those of the battleship Camperdown. In broad daylight, during a maneuver, she was run into head on by her companion ship, and in less than a quarter of an hour she had disappeared in the waves, carrying with her all on board. Twenty-one officers, including Vice Admiral Tryon, are reported drowned, and the great fighting ship lies a useless wreck, bottom side up, beneath the waves. The disaster is one of the most horrible, as well as one of the most disgraceful, that have ever befallen the English navy. The Victoria was a battleship of 10,470 tons and 14,000 horse-power and mounted fifty guns. The Camperdown is also of the Mediterranean fleet and is a slightly smaller boat than the Victoria. She is of 10,600 tons and 11,500 horse-power.

Tripoli, near where the collision happened, is about seventy miles from Damascus. It has a small harbor, which is so shallow as to be notoriously unsafe. It is supposed that the Victoria found a lack of sea room in putting about as the Camperdown came on, and the latter boat hit the flagship squarely on the starboard side with her ram. The Camperdown was moving under a high steam pressure, and the effect was such as would have been made with an ax on a plank. The plates of the Victoria just forward of the turret were torn apart and a perfect flood poured into the hold of the flagship. She began to sink immediately. The engines of the Camperdown were reversed at once, but not before she had hit the Victoria a second time and completed the work of destruction. Every effort was made to save the ship, but the Victoria settled so fast that this was seen to be impossible, and the men, losing all discipline, cast loose the small boats and attempted to reach the Camperdown. Only three of the boats got free of the suction of the sinking ship. The rest were overturned and many of the occupants of these were drowned with the men who were cooped up in the battleship beyond all chance of rescue. Vice Admiral Tryon is said to be one of those who went down with the ship. The Victoria hardly moved forward after the blow. The water poured so rapidly into her engine-room that the fires were extinguished before the engineer had time to act.

Some of the officers and crew managed to get out of the suction caused by the sinking vessel, and were rescued. Among those lost is Vice Admiral Tryon. The first reports of the disaster stated that about two hundred men had been drowned, but later dispatches show that the loss of life was far greater, not less than 400 of the officers and crew of the Victoria having gone down with their ship.

The Liberty Bell Cast.

The Columbian liberty bell has been cast at the Meneely bell foundry in Troy, N. Y. Mrs. Cleveland did not press the electric button which was to release the metal from the furnace, allowing it to run into the molds. There was some misunderstanding in making the wire connections at Gray Gables.

An Arizona Romance, Written for This Paper.

CHAPTER I.

THE SOLDIERS AND THE MINERS.

Only those who have seen it done can from any idea of the ease and rapidity with which a company of miners can lay waste a beautiful bit of landscape, tranform a veritable garden spot into a scene of utter desolation, and a stream of crystal clearness into a flood as thick, black, and forbidding-looking as the Styx itself. It was some years ago that a charming stretch of hill and valley in Arizona, America, fell under the ban of the gold-seeker. Birds, flowers, trees, and herbage disappeared almost in a day. The uncouth habitations and rude fixtures of a mining camp sprang up nearly in a single night, amid the yelling, singing, and shouting of the excited multitude which, with inflamed eyes and haggard faces, fell upon mother earth as if bent upon tearing her very heart out. This place of desecration is called Camp Tampa, taking its name from that of a military station close by.

One object in the afternoon landscape is in contrast to the rude disturbance, and it is a girl of 18, who sits in a plainly condemnatory mood, as she gazes from the hillside into the valley where the miners are ruthlessly at work. Eleanor Lorley may gain in rarity by being the only girl at Camp Tampa, yet she would be lovely among any number of her sex. She is the daughter of Col. Lorley, the commandant of the army post, and has acquired something of imperiousness by having enjoyed a year of queenly homage from the small company of soldiers. Now that a horde of miners have invaded the pretty valley, she feels that she ought, and might, issue an effective edict of exclusion. When the long shadows disappear with the sunset, Miss Lorley bethinks that it is time to go back to the barracks, and, with a last hateful glance at the quite unconscious miners in the distance, she quits the scene.

Next morning, when Colonel Lorley shouts for his orderly, before getting out of bed, there is not the usual response by a quick and obsequious servant in the guise of a soldier. The commandant makes an outcry with some profanity in it. In the middle of his eloquent but rather highly spiced peroration his daughter opens the door. She comes to him across the room in her usual free and graceful manner and an airily seductive costume suggestive of slumber. She sinks into a chair and twines her pretty arm negligently round the parental pillow.

"What is it, my dear?" asks the Colonel, excitedly, raising himself on his elbow. "Why doesn't Sanders answer? Why are you here?"

"My dear," says Eleanor, drawing her dainty frilled white cambric garment more closely round her with a touch of old Roman grandeur that almost transforms it into a toga, "you have only lived to be a Colonel with no command. Sanders and the rest of the men have deserted, and joined the gold-hunters."

"Eh?" says the Colonel. His elbow gives way and he sinks back upon his pillow.

"Merely that," says his daughter. It cannot be said but that there is a sense of suppressed enjoyment in her tone. "Now, don't take a wrong view of it, dearest. Regard it as I do—rather as a distinction to be compelled to court-martial your whole army."

As that army has consisted of only thirty men for a month, the rest of the regiment having been scattered to other Arizona outposts, the matter is not of vast dimensions.

"Besides," Eleanor continued, "the miners have sent word that they want the very ground we're camped on, and we've got to get out."

"Eh?" says the Colonel again, in a somewhat dazed fashion, being (as he himself would have told you) thoroughly flabbergasted by the wholesale desertion.

"Don't give in," repeats the slender, fragile, white-robed figure in the chair, leaning forward so as the more effectually to emphasize her remarks with a slim but determined forefinger, and becoming more and more the Roman matron every moment. "Stick to your principles; defy these miserable fellows. Be yourself"—with increasing force, as though she fears there is instant danger of his becoming somebody else.

"Give in! What d'ye mean, child?" says the Colonel, indignantly. And indeed her backing up is plainly thrown away, as the warrior, scenting the battle from afar, has (metaphorically speaking) buckled on his armor and is ahead charging the host. "I must get up," says he.

"I'm afraid you can't have any one to help you to-day," says the daughter, regretfully.

"Are they all gone?"

"Everybody except Surgeon Brannard. And you couldn't ask him to do your orderly's work."

"Well, I'll get up," says the Colonel again, as though the subject is beyond him. "Do you mean to tell me that all the men have gone?"

"Every one of them; as daylight came they melted. They took all the provisions along, too. But get up now, there's a dear heart, and let us have breakfast and a consultation, with what appetite we may."

She carries herself and the pretty frilled robe out of the rough barracks room, with an air of unflinching determination, albeit she is but a slender, lissome creature. She is very pretty, very high-spirited, and just a little spoiled. Her mother died when she was barely five, and ever since the Colonel has had to think a great many times before daring to say "No" to her about a great many things.

The girl is assisted in her preparation of an uncommonly plain breakfast by Surgeon Arthur Brannard. He is a reserved and distrait young man, yet everybody likes him. No one at Camp Tampa has been at all sure whether his relations with the Colonel's daughter are all of the indifferently friendly order or whether he is heart and soul her own. But though Nobody is thus ignorant, perhaps Somebody is not, and Miss Lorley herself might have enlightened them upon this disputed subject but for the fact that she always grows strangely deaf whenever his name is introduced. He wears eyeglasses and might, by the miners, be termed a "tenderfoot," which is the American nickname for a smooth dandy among rough men. After the morning meal, during which the three discuss the deserters, the miners, and other matters relating to their suddenly lonesome condition, the young pair are left alone, while the Colonel goes off by himself to consider.

"We are in a terrible trouble, aren't we?" says Miss Lorley, softly. "But we shan't starve, indeed. They"—alluding to the enemy in general with a little frown—"sha'n't have that satisfaction. You really mustn't take it so much to heart."

"Oh, no. I can't now," says the silent young man, after which he falls into one of his brown studies. Waking up from it he goes on, placidly, "I did all that long ago, don't you see."

"What?" demands she, somewhat startled.

"Why, the taking you to heart," returns he.

"Oh!" She turns to him with unexpected vivacity. "Wasn't it a pity about the breakfast cakes?" she says.

"Whose cakes?" startled in his turn.

"Our cakes—mine."

Pleased with her complete success in having drifted the conversation into a safer channel, she now confesses to him all about those indomitable pieces of dough, dwelling with heart-rending pathos upon their stiffness and their hard and unyielding natures.

The young officer, having laughed a little, proceeds to console her.

"We are not so badly off," he says. "The boys have all deserted; and who can altogether blame them—with $13 a month and a possible fortune in gold offered to them for a choice? So much for them. As to the rest of the miners, they believe there is a gold foundation for this post, and you can't expect them to respect even the military in their crazed eagerness. Why, I am tempted strongly to resign my commission and take to the mines. Awful bore, you know, to keep out of it."

"For you, yes. It was quite too good of you to stay here with papa—and me."

"For me?" not heeding the latter part of her little speech, and dropping his glasses in his amazement. "Bore for you, I meant. You're a clever girl; perhaps that's why you took such an extraordinary view of my remark."

"Was it so very extraordinary?" making him a present of a very lovely smile. "Well, let it be so, if you will. At least let me say we acknowledge the trouble we give you."

"Oh, as to that, I like it."

"What! Trouble? Well, I don't," says she gayly. "And to think," beating her small foot with a certain haughty petulance upon the floor, "we should have had none of it but for the perfidy of these soldiers. But they shall be taught their places yet. We shall neither truckle to them nor bend."

"I wouldn't truckle, certainly," says the young man, regarding with a peculiar sense of tenderness the slight figure beneath him in the low chair, with its lovely mutinous eyes and mouth. "But I think," with a carefully casual air, "during such times as these, when a sense of injury is rife, I should bend—a little."

"What!"

He drops his glasses again, but otherwise shows no signs of contrition or any desire whatever to retract his offensive remark.

"I really mean it," he says equably. "Moderation at this peculiar juncture is everything, and your father (forgive me!) is a little—well severe in his actions. He might let the soldiers dig, and even move the barracks to give the miners a chance."

At this Miss Lorley rises and confronts him. She is so pretty that even mistaken indignation sits well upon her, and, indeed, only serves to heighten her charms.

"My father," she says now, very coldly, "is always right. One must be either right or wrong. That even you" (as though he were a being past all grace) "must allow. If wrong, certainly let him bend—your word, I believe"—disdainfully—"if right, let him maintain discipline. These are his sentiment and mine. We, knowing ourselves to be right——"

"Very foolish sentiments," says he, calmly. "The wise man, in a case like this, would temporize. But really, you know, 'bend' was your word, not mine."

"Temporizing just now means weakness," says she, ignoring his protest.

"I hardly see that. The Colonel has taken too high a stand."

There is a small upright piano in the room. It has been brought from civilization into the wilderness for the girl's sake. She plays and sings well, as Surgeon Brannard admiringly knows. During the present conversation she has seated herself at the instrument and thrummed the keys by way of emphasis. But now she turns rather abruptly upon the man who dares criticise her father's conduct, and ejaculates: "You wouldn't fight your foes, eh? You are a coward!"

"A coward!" He shrinks from her as though she had struck him. An absurd sensibility about his want of physical prowess clings to him always, and renders him peculiarly sensitive to any word that may seem to hint at his self-supposed lack of manliness.

"It was cowardly to suggest that my father should give in."

"I don't think I said that," says her companion, recovering from his chagrin by an effort, and turning to her a face very pale and still. "I merely advised a little forbearance, which, in times such as these, is not only kindly but necessary."

"Papa is not wanting in forbearance, yet you blame him, and to me. I will not hear him censured," says the girl, with tears in her eyes.

"You willfully misunderstand me."

"I most unwillingly understand you."

"You wrong me, indeed," says the young man, eagerly; then he stops. "It is useless arguing with you now," he says.

This is the last straw.

"I am in such an unreasonable temper, you mean?" says she, with the sweetest smile, but an ominous uplifting of her pretty brows. "Ah! good morning, then."

"Good morning."

They lightly touched each other's hands and parted.

An hour later Eleanor has not seen either her father or her lover. She is in her own small chamber and is meditating rather more upon the conduct of the miners than that of her father. She presumes that the two men are together in consultation over the perplexity of the situation. At length she emerges into the stockaded grounds of the barracks in quest of them. The usual sentry is absent from the gate. Suddenly it opens and Private Patrick McCune stealthily enters, taking care to quickly shut himself in.

"What is it? What is the matter?" says Eleanor hurriedly.

"Murdher's the matter!" said the soldier, with terrible intensity. "It's in the very air ye're breathing. They say as how they'll have it out wid the Colonel th' night because he won't let them dig in these grounds."

"They? Who?" asks the girl haughtily, with increased agitation.

"The boys, miss. They're comin' at midnight to burn the barracks over his head, an' then thrae him out, an' tache him a lesson he'll 'have no occasion to remember.' I give you their own words, miss. They'll kill him, I tell ye, as sure as ye're standin' on that spot."

The informant is gone before she can question him further. It is evident that his loyalty is exhausted in the risk of the visit, and that he has no idea of giving further aid to the three persons at the post. The girl stands for a moment dazed by the news she has received. Then she goes in quest of the men. She finds her father readily, and tells him what the Irishman has said.

"Where is Arthur?" she asks, unconsciously using his first name in her excitement.

"I don't know. He hasn't been with me since breakfast."

It does not take them long to search the premises. The surgeon is not there. His horse is gone, too.

"It looks as though he, too, has deserted us," says Colonel Lorley.

The girl recalls the young man's remark that he had been tempted to quit military duty and take to gold hunting.

"I didn't do him an injustice," she says. "He is a coward!"

CHAPTER II.

WITH BLACK SAM.

It was true that Surgeon Arthur Brannard had quitted Camp Tampa, but not for the purpose which Eleanor had imputed to him. These are the particulars: An unusually rough and unkempt-looking individual turns his horse's head toward the miner's valley. He seems completely lost in thought, and if his horse were not a most intelligent animal, and in quite a different frame of mind from his master, both of them would certainly meet their death in some one of the hundred pits and trenches which scar and seam the ground. The rider pulls up his horse on the edge of one of the shafts, and calls out good-naturedly to the group of miners at work in it:

"Hello, down there. Could any one of you tell me where to find a doctor?"

"There ain't none here," comes from one of the men at the bottom of the shaft; "but there's an army surgeon over to the barracks."

"Thank you, my friend," replies the stranger, as he rides leisurely away.

"No friend of yours, if I can help it," growls a miner as he gazes after the horseman. "If that fellow doesn't belong to some gang of bandits then I'm greatly mistaken. The boys will make a necktie for him some day."

The rider halts in front of the gate at Camp Tampa and dismounts. His heavy jack-boots crunch the gravel as he strides toward Brannard, who is in the yard.

"Well, what's the matter?" the officer asks. "Anything serious happened?"

"A broken leg; that's all, Doctor," replies the man, in a careless tone, "but that's bad in such a country as this, where it's pretty hard to make an honest living with two sound legs."

Brannard stares at the fellow with a puzzled sort of smile, which seems to worry him a little, for he fumbles with his cartridge belt, and then breaks out:

"But you can fix him all right, can't you, Doctor?"

"That depends," was the answer. "I must see him first. If it's only a fracture I can soon get him on his pins again. How did it happen?"

"Lost his footing and fell about twenty-five feet into a rocky hole. We straightened him out as well as we could, and I've been riding hard to get you there as soon as possible."

"Isn't he down there in the valley?"

"No; four miles away."

"That means two hours' absence from the post."

"You shall be paid, Doctor, never fear," comes from the man in a calm tone as he draws out a well-filled chamois bag. "I suppose nuggets 'll do just as well as coin. Have you a pair of scales, Doctor?"

The officer explains that he was not, by army etiquette, permitted to take pay for his services to civilians; but he consents to obey the call, and is soon in readiness to start. After taking a last look at his holsters, which are filled with all the necessary surgical paraphernalia, he swings himself lightly into the saddle, and rides out of camp in company with his unknown guide.

It is the middle of summer, and, the stream in the valley being low, they follow the sandy bed as the best road.

"How large is your party?" asks Brannard.

"About eight of us," is the reply.

"And you have found gold-diggings farther up the creek?"

"Not exactly on this creek, but on one flowing into it, which is dried up now."

"How long have you been in Arizona?"

"Oh, about to or three years."

"And your name is?"

"Jim."

"That seems to be a favorite name with miners."

"Doctor," now breaks in the unknown, "as you seem to be so fond of asking questions, I'll ask you some. What's the news? We're so out of the world that we never hear anything."

"The latest news from Calitro," replies Brannard, without noticing the man's exhibition of impatience, "is that a gold transport has been surprised and robbed of $100,000. It's a pretty condition of things when the Government is powerless to prevent these surprises. It is said to have been the work of Black Sam, and as the vigilantes police will go through the region pretty thoroughly, it is to be hoped they will capture the gang, especially as a large reward is offered."

"How large?"

"Ten thousand dollars, I believe."

"If Black Sam and his gang are stupid enough to encamp in the hills," replies Jim, "it's likely that they will bag him. Well, here we are at the bed of the stream. We turn off here to the east."

The two rode along in silence for awhile, when Brainard, glancing at his pocket compass, discovers that their course, instead of being as at first northerly, is now directly south. He calls attention to it.

"Yes," says Jim, "it may be that the brook flows from the south."

"Then we might have chosen a much shorter way."

"Possibly, but it would have been a rocky road. Trust me. I know this country."

They now enter a narrow gorge, and in a few moments a small tent, piles of sand and a pit meet the surgeon's gaze. Some rough-looking men sit there.

"Are those your comrades?"

"Yes, Doctor."

"They don't seem to be very busy."

"Well, you know, Doctor, when there's sickness in the family it interferes with business."

"Is the injured man in the tent?"

"No; there was no room for him, so we rigged up a sort of hospital, which I think you will admire."

They both dismount.

"What's the news, Jack?" asks Jim.

"Oh, nothing special," answers the man addressed. "A couple of deputy sheriffs came along and asked for our permits to dig. Of course it was all right."

"Did they ask any questions?"

"They wanted to know whether we had seen anything of Black Sam and his gang. We told them that no suspicious characters had made their appearance."

"And then they went off?"

"Yes; they were bound West—they said to the Colorado reservation."

"Well, then we sha'n't see them again for a while. Where's the rest of the boys?"

"Billy is with him. Tom, Bob and Ned have gone to Henderson's ranch to buy beef. Our grub is running low."

Brannard begins to show signs of impatience.

"Yes, yes, Doctor," cries Jim; "there's just a little formality to be observed here. You must be blindfolded."

"Are you mad? I shall not consent."

"Come, Doctor; be reasonable," urges Jim; "there's a big secret at the bottom of this."

"I don't like your actions," cries the surgeon. "I shall have nothing to do with you."

"Don't be foolish. You must do your duty."

"As things have turned out, I refuse!"

"Then we shall force you," and as Jim nods to his comrades, they draw their pistols and level them at the surgeon's head. "Will you do what you have been brought to do?" inquires Jim, in an angry tone, "or would you prefer to be bulleted?"

"Naturally, I prefer the former. But what's the necessity of blindfolding me?"

"Well, you see, we have discovered a very rich mine, and we don't want you to know the entrance to it."

Once blindfolded, the men lead Brannard here and there for a few moments, and then suddenly make for a definite point. A chilliness, as if in some underground place, is at once noticeable.

The trickling of water reaches his ears. Jim, who is carrying his wallet, and leading him by the hand, calls out: "Stoop down—stoop down!" And then, after a moment, Brannard feels the band loosened from his eyes and hears Jim say: "Here we are, Doctor!"

The unwilling visitor finds himself in a roomy, cave-like place, lighted by two lanterns. In one corner lie a number of small, strong packing boxes and leather sacks, such as are used to transport gold ore. In another the man with the broken leg is stretched out on a rude couch. He is a rough-looking fellow, with black beard, hair and pale face.

"Without a doubt," thinks Brannard to himself, "this is Black Sam, and I have tumbled into a nice nest of bandits."

It was in truth Black Sam, the famous robber, once a tavern-keeper at Fort Worth.

"Here's the doctor," says Jim to his leader, to whom he then whispers a few words.

"Step this way," is the injured man's reply. "Do you know who I am?"

"I do not."

"Then so much the better for you. Come, set my leg for me."

The task accomplished, Brannard thus addresses his patient: "Everything is now in order. You must lie still a few weeks, until the bones knit. And now that I have done my part, I ask to be let go."

"You've got to stay here for the present, Doctor."

"Impossible! My friends at the camp——"

"They must get on without you."

"How long shall you keep me here?"

"Until I can walk. That's for safety."

"And must I be kept prisoner here for six long weeks?" cries Brannard, beside himself.

"Why not?" replies Sam, calmly. "I'll pay you—well, say a thousand dollars. We've plenty of the stuff."

"I will accept none of your stolen gold!" cries Brannard, pointing to the boxes and sacks.

"Don't talk nonsense, Doctor. A thousand dollars in your wallet is better than a bullet in your head." The surgeon was silent. "Come, decide!"

"I yield to brute force."

"You've got good sense."

"A searching party will be sent out for me."

"Have you a wife and children?"

"No."

"Then don't worry. Folks will only think you're off on a journey somewhere. That's all."

An adjoining room in the cavern was assigned to Brannard, and he was well provided for, but his thoughts at once turned to making his escape from this nest of bandits as soon as possible.

In the afternoon of the following day Jim enters the cave and announces to Black Sam that Tom, Bob and Ned have arrived. They have not been able to get any meat, but have brought in two prisoners for whom they purpose demanding heavy ransoms.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Knew Only the One Way.

A man went with a telegram to an office in Broadway, says the New York Herald. It was midnight. Handing the paper to the fellow in the cage he said:

"I want that delivered at 8 o'clock to-morrow morning."

The fellow in the cage said: "We can deliver it within an hour."

"I don't want my friend aroused at 1 o'clock in the morning. Send it away from here at 7, so that he will get it at 8."

The fellow in the cage was puzzled. "We don't do business that way," he declared. "I wouldn't know how to fix it so as not to be delivered at once."

After a great deal of cogitation a bright idea struck him. "If you pay the tolls on the words 'Don't deliver till 8 o'clock,'" he said, "that will do it all right."

And so the customer paid the extra toll. But did the scheme work? Not much. Within an hour a messenger boy arrived with the dispatch at the house of the sender's friend. He rang the bell for ten minutes. Then there came a policeman who asked what the matter was. The messenger boy said he guessed some one's wife must be dead as he had an important message that had got to be delivered at once. So the policeman hammered at the side of the house with his night stick and awoke everyone in it—about thirty all told. In the midst of the uproar the dispatch was delivered to the person for whom it was intended. Trembling at the fear of a great bereavement, he opened it and read as follows:

"Will expect you to dinner Tuesday.
"JIM."

The messenger boy went back proud of having done his duty, and the fool telegraph company increased its capital by $3,000,000 the following day.

Water Drops Cause Torture.

The mightiness of the little drop of water is again illustrated by the wager which an American has just won in Vienna. He bet a considerable sum with a Vienna acrobat that he could not endure to have a litre of water fall drop by drop from a height of three feet upon his hand. When 300 drops had fallen, the athlete's face became red and he looked as if in pain. At the 420th drop he gave up, saying it was impossible to bear the pain any longer. The palm of his hand was swollen and inflamed, and in one place the skin had broken open.

IT sort of worries some women to be told by the husband there's one thing lacking to make their new hats perfect, until they learn it's merely the money to pay for it.

THERE is certainly little encouragement in literature for that man whose only returns from the business are represented in the manuscripts that come back to him.

INDIANA INCIDENTS.

SOBER OR STARTLING, FAITHFULLY RECORDED.

An Interesting Summary of the More Important Doings of Our Neighbors—Weddings and Deaths—Crimes, Casualties and General News Notes.

Condensed State News.

WASHINGTON BRUNEMER, a farmer near Franklin, was killed by lightning.

CHARLES WALLICK of Peru, was perhaps fatally hurt while making a blast.

THE Frankton Land and Improvement Company has closed another deal for a large tract of land.

FOUR valuable horses belonging to Hon. Anthony Stevenson, of Spencer County, were killed by lightning.

A MAD-DOG scare at Albany resulted in a two-mile chase and the killing of the brute by Smith Clark, of that place.

WILLIAM CASSADY, a Muncie newsboy, was rescued from the river after he had gone down three times, and will recover.

ALFRED WILLIAMS of Washington County, who escaped from the reform school at Plainfield last January, was caught in Bedford.

JESSE FRANCE of Fort Wayne, who playfully snapped a revolver at his friend Henry Mathena, instantly killing him, was acquitted by the jury.

WASHINGTON LACKEY, a wealthy farmer near Vincennes, while cutting wheat, was literally cut to pieces by being thrown in front of the machine knives. Horses ran away.

FREDERICK GOINS, a prominent farmer, 57 years old, residing twelve miles northeast of Noblesville, was killed by a tree falling on him. He was a soldier, getting a pension of $72 per month.

WILLIAM ROSS, a driver in No. 6 Block Coal Company mine at Brazil, while at work moving some cars in the entry, was caught by a heavy fall of slate and badly mashed. He will probably die.

A SUIT for $2,000 damages has been filed against Mrs. Eliza C. Hamilton, living near Colfax, whose dog bit John B. Stengley, taking a piece of flesh from his leg and arm and also from his thumb.

SEYMOUR saloon men have petitioned the Council for a reduction in license from $250 to $100 to make up for the stringency in the money market and having to keep their saloons closed on Sunday.

JOHN WILLIAMS of Converse, had his hand badly mangled. Morphine was administered by the surgeon who dressed the wounds, and he became unconscious under the influence of the drug and remained so for several hours. He is in a serious condition.

FRANK LEADBETTER, a Muncie shoe clerk, had a narrow escape from death by the electric cars in that city. A summer car collided with his vehicle and the buggy was smashed to pieces. He was sent up in the air and dropped in a seat in the car with no injury.

CHARLES R. METTONAY, a farmer living near Winamac, went out early the other morning to bring in forty head of cattle. In attempting to take a short cut across the quicksand beds of the Pick Mink marshes the cattle were buried out of sight in twenty feet of quicksand.

BARTON CALLOWAY, colored, an ex-convict, who shot at another colored man at a Republican rally at Terre Haute in 1888 and instantly killed Dollie Phillips, white, was instantly killed the other morning by handling a live electric wire at the rolling-mill where he was employed.

STELLA LOWE, the 3-year-old daughter of Riley Lowe, a section hand on the Big Four, living at Waldron, was playing with some matches and set fire to her dress. Her clothing was burned from her body and one side from head to foot was virtually cooked. There is no hope of recovery.

CHAS. F. GRIFFIN and W. H. Fitzgerald were found guilty of contempt by the United States Court, and were ordered to remove the electric car tracks from the streets of Hammond or go to jail. Trouble grew out of an effort of the electric line to cross the Michigan Central track.

AT Noblesville, Anna Mahan, 14 years old, committed suicide by swallowing carbolic acid. After swallowing the dose she told her father she had taken something to kill herself and asked him to smell her breath. She died in fifteen minutes, and before a physician could be procured.

THE east-bound passenger on the Big Four ran into a large stone that had been rolled on the track near Waynetown. The engineer saw the rock in time to check up, and saved a bad wreck. The place was on a high embankment, well selected by the would-be train-wreckers for a dreadful catastrophe.

JAMES YOUNG, 64, of Gas City, died recently of hydrophobia. Two months ago Mr. Young was attacked by a mad dog and was horribly bitten. He was taken to Chicago for treatment and returned much better. The other night he grew suddenly worse, went into convulsions and suffered intensely until death relieved him. At times it took three men to hold him in bed. He imagined that he saw strange things in the room.

THE following patents have been awarded to citizens of Indiana: Charles Anderson, assignor to South Bend Iron Works, South Bend, sulky plow; Robert Baker, Dayton, sash fastener; Thomas M. Bales, Dublin, fanning mill; George N. Cleveland, Freelandsville, corn harvester; Frederick W. Frank, assignor of one-half to H. Lorenz, Indianapolis, caster; Isaac P. Osborn, Florida, fence; William A. Walker, Evansville, parlor game.

AT Madison, Frank Hill's livery stable, valued at $7,000, was destroyed by fire. It was not insured. Charles Cumbach's residence and shoe store, adjoining, were slightly damaged. Insured. Dr. Curtis, the veterinary surgeon, was thrown by a horse and badly hurt.

JOHN GEAR, section foreman, and Jack Cain, both of Liberty, attempted to board a passing freight train and were drawn under the wheels and killed. Both were terribly mangled. They were good citizens, and their sudden death is a great shock. Both leave families.

WHEAT harvesting has begun in the southern and some of the central counties of the State. Several places report the yield good, and some say it is excellent.

AS MRS. ALLEN EMERICK, wife of a prominent farmer residing south of Wabash, was driving to Wabash, her horse took fright on the hill and ran away. The buggy upset and Mrs. Emerick was thrown out, and received a kick in the head, the hoof of the frightened horse laying open her forehead, cutting the temporal artery and inflicting a frightful wound. She was unconscious when picked up, and lying at the point of death. She is about sixty-five years old.

They Lack Sand or Something.

The Columbia City Post is trying to make its exchanges believe it knows more about matters at Auburn than the COURIER does. This is easily settled. Let the Post name five men in Auburn who signed a petition for the appointment of the successful candidate for postmaster here. We confess we can't do it. And if the Post can, we shall concede that the Post has one advantage at least. And now while we are on that subject, we might as well inform the Post that it is not an office we are kicking for; it is for decent treatment. The course that McNagny and his backers have taken in Auburn, is an insult to every self-respecting democrat here, and if no one else has the manliness or courage to say it, the COURIER has, and will. It matters not a little bit what pompous and self-constituted critics say, the COURIER will stand up for its manhood and for the manhood of the decent democrats of Auburn and DeKalb county. This principle may not have either sympathy or support in Columbia City, but in Auburn and DeKalb county, it has both. It is no difference to us whether McNagny wants to have a "newspaper controversy" or not. The question, is has any defense whatever, for the course he has taken. We say he has not. If he has, let him or his friends here, or elsewhere, defend him. They can take their own method for it. We have asked for it. But it seems there is no one with courage or ability to do more than stand away off and call names. There are plenty of good democrats, the best in the county—not only here but all over the county, who object to these high-handed proceedings, the half of which has not yet been told. And the Post will be wise if it can see that calling names is not considered by intelligent people as a defense for a wrong committed against them. If the editor of this paper were the only democrat in DeKalb county that had been treated in the way complained of the trouble would stop at once. But we had all asked, and it was all we did ask, that the people be consulted. They were not consulted, and we keep asking that this last assertion be disproved if not believed. But all the reply we get is a sneer or an offensive name. This is no proof.

WHEAT cutting began in southern Indiana last week.

THE Keeley Institute at Hagerstown, Md., was burned Monday. Loss about $10,000.

INDIA has stopped the free coinage of silver. This is likely to have a bad effect on silver in this country.

MAIL carriers cost Uncle Sam $140,000 last year for car fare alone, on city railways. In Chicago alone it amounted to $27,000.

SENATOR STANFORD of California died last week. His wealth is put down at sixty millions. The most of it will probably go to the great university that bears his name.

TRAIN robbers were fooled one day last week out in Missouri. When they tried to make the fireman throw up his hands, he turned a hot water pipe on them and so drove them away.

SUSPENDED bank at Kendallville is now at work again. The same is true of that at Indianapolis, and over the country generally. Gold has taken a turn and is coming back from Europe. The danger seems about over.

GOV. ALTGELD, of Illinois, has pardoned the anarchists, Fielden, Schwab and Neebe, who were in prison, Neebe for fifteen years and the other two for life, for their complicity in the Haymarket riot on the 4th of May, 1886.

A MAN in Franklin, Ind., has invented a voting machine. A voter goes into the booth and pushes a button and so votes his straight ticket. But if he wishes to vote a mixed ticket he can press a button for the name of each candidate, so that he can vote for anyone he pleases.

ALEXANDER ORR has been selected for postmaster at Kendallville. Orr, like Hough at Ligonier, had not applied and did not want it, but that made no difference with McNagny. A man who selected for the Wolcottville postoffice, a man living in another county, would not let such a little matter stand between him and his choice.

ENGLISH battleship Victoria, a model of which is in the fair at Chicago was run into by another big cruiser last week near Tripoli on the African coast of the Mediterranean, and sent to the bottom. More than 400 lives were lost, as she had a full crew on. Many spectators were watching the naval display in which she was taking part.

TOWNSHIP trustees will not be elected next spring, as the April election is wiped out. They will be elected at the November election, but will hold office one year longer than they would under the old law, going out of office the first Monday in August 1895 instead of 1894 the term for which they were elected. The same is true of assessors. Supervisors will be appointed by the trustees but hold the terms same as trustees.

"REPUBLICANS stand by their guns," republican papers are saying when they allude to the recent speeches of Gov. McKinley. Of course they do. Republicans never learn anything. They get a hobby into their heads—something their leaders have told them—and it never gets out. Even the avalanche of public opinion that ran over them at the last election did not seem to teach them anything. Several of their papers are still going on telling what a blessing a tariff tax is.

REPUBLICAN papers are asking why the democratic administration does not do something that will raise the price of wheat and wool. The question shows their ignorance. The president cannot make laws. Even under a democratic administration the McKinley law is bad enough to kill our foreign trade, and if we can't sell our wheat abroad, the price will be low. It has taken thirty years, with as many sessions of congress to bring about the present disastrous condition and we cannot expect to see the trouble healed in as many weeks, with no congress in session.

THE National Tribune, a paper published ostensibly for the G. A. R., but in fact a rabid republican political sheet is putting out items about the "soldier-hating press of the country," evidently trying to create the opinion that this term is applicable to the democratic press. And such slush is being copied by republican papers everywhere. But so far not one of them has been able to name a paper that hates soldiers. Soldiers themselves know there is no such class of papers, but they must also realize that uncalled for abuse of this sort is not in the nature of things calculated to make friends.

State Editorial Association.

The democratic editorial association met last Wednesday and Thursday at Spring Fountain Park, near Warsaw. It was their summer meeting, and of course a portion of the time was given to recreation for which Warsaw with its beautiful parks and lakes, furnishes abundant opportunities. About the usual number was present, several bringing their wives or children. The Spring Fountain Park Hotel, was headquarters and the gentlemanly proprietor in charge left nothing to be desired in the attention he gave to his guests. It is in every regard a first-class hotel though two miles from the city. Nothing was lacking, nothing was neglected, to make the pencil pushers feel that they were welcome to the best in the land. And this remark is also true of Beyer Brothers, the proprietors of the Park and its belongings. They have always shown their appreciation of the fraternity, which haf been there on several occasions and enjoyed their favors. There are few newspaper men in the state, who have not cause to remember the Beyer Brothers for many courtesies extended to them. The owners of the steamers also, placed all they had at the disposal of the newspaper men and their wives. The people of Warsaw, too, came over to the Park on the second day, and took the entire force over to their beautiful city, showed them their magnificent court house, took them to their lovely Lakeside Park, and all through it, then out on the lake, then to their finely improved cemetery, and at last back to Spring Fountain Park. Warsaw always does herself proud on these occasions, as we have before had occasion to know. The newspaper men all speak highly of the treatment at both places, and of the beautiful parks and Lakes. Several excellent papers were read at the business meeting and altogether the meeting was one of the most pleasant the association has held.

The Kendallville Bank.

Last week the First National Bank of Kendallville, of which John Mitchell is the president and chief stockholder, was compelled to close its doors on account of a run from its depositors, one man alone taking out $15,000, and complications arising from the shutting down of the great factory of Flint, Walling and Co. But such a man as John Mitchell was not to be crushed, and he was soon on his feet again, as shown by the following dispatch, sent Monday to the Ft. Wayne Journal. It reads:

Kendallville, June 26—This little city has recovered from the financial excitement occasioned by the closing of Mitchell's bank, and business is going on as usual. Cashier Bower said to-day that the bank would pay every dollar it owed and resume business, showing how senseless the scare of last week was.

The Flint-Walling Manufacturing company resumed operations this morning, and employed all its men. Confidence is entirely restored.

Banks are all Right.

What we mean is that the banks are as good and safe as they ever were. The trouble just now is that depositors have got frightened and keep taking their money out of the banks leaving the banks with only their own cash to do business on. If a bank has $50,000 in money deposited by men who had the money to spare, the bank takes this money and loans it out to parties who need money to use in their business. In this way, the chances are that the bank has loaned out at least $30,000 of this $50,000 and has only $20,000 of it left in the vaults, and at the same time the bank may have its own individual cash all loaned out. Now suppose these depositors all get in a panic, and all come in and demand this $50,000. The bank can only pay $20,000 and must then close its doors. It may have a vast amount of notes due to it, both on its depositors' money and its own. But if it cannot collect such notes as are due, it must close up. Now, if these depositors had let their money remain in the bank, the bank would be all right; the depositors would be safe, because, when they dropped in, one at a time as they usually do, there would be no trouble, but each would be paid promptly. Here is where depositors make their mistake. When they deposit money in a bank, they should ascertain the responsibility of the men back of it, and then trust them. Give them a chance. In other words having deposited money in a sound bank, let it remain until you need it yourself. But just at present as we have said before, there is a sort of general uneasiness, caused by the failure of a number of badly managed banks in Chicago, and elsewhere. But we do not believe there is need for uneasiness. The well managed banks, we believe are safe as they ever were. There is as much money on hand as usual, and as much in the country at large as there ever is. But if depositors take their money out of the bank and keep it in their pockets or houses and so far reduce the amount in circulation, trouble and loss may follow. Banks may still have plenty of money, but they dare not loan it for fear depositors may call for it or other banks need it. The people who drew their money out, lose the interest on it, and when burglars find out, as they soon will, that private houses have a hoard of money, they will take advantage of it to help themselves. The way to restore confidence, is to give faith to well established institutions like those in this county. If this is done, the danger is already past.

Epworth League Convention at Cleveland June 29th to July 2nd.

The Lake Shore & Michigan Southern R'y will on June 28th and 29th, sell excursion tickets to Cleveland and return at one fare for the round trip, good to return until July 3rd, inclusive. 26

After an absence of 15 years will again visit Waterloo every Saturday at Lock's Hotel, Waterloo.

His success in the treatment of piles can be amply attested by hundreds whom he cured during his former visits. I can cure any case of piles, no matter of how long standing, or how hopeless the case may be. The patient suffers no pain or inconvenience. The Review says there are abundant evidences of renewed prosperity at Butler in spite of the removal of so many men to other points. We believe they will find over there, that when they get weaned from railroad pap, they will find themselves stronger and healthier on a diet of their own preparing. George Arnold, one of Garrett's live democrats was over here Monday. He served the town as marshal very acceptably, one term. He says that city government is not very popular over there, especially a republican city government. The first step the new city board took was to raise their salaries. This was "ordinance No. 1" and it was never published. Just why all the other ordinances were published and "No. 1" was not, we do not know. Perhaps they did not care to have the people know about the salary grab. The next thing they did was to put the license up, at least on some. The man who delivers oil and gasolene, they charged a license of $100. The way the new government starts out, will make even the Clipper gang wish they had supported the democratic ticket.

Wonderful Jerusalem.

Jerusalem! What a world of thought is awakened by a single word spoken. Jerusalem—the loved, the hated, the idolized, the despised; destroyed and rebuilded again and again; the scene of the Savior's triumph and tragic death. The cradle of the Christian faith; the inspiration of humanity. How wonderful is thy history! What a theme for the poet and the painter. Every hill and valley so rich in tender associations, the very nerve center of religious history. Fortunately the ancient city and all the surrounding country has been reproduced by the painters' art in a great Cyclorama, showing the city in its glory under Herod, and at the time of the Crucifixion of the Savior. The view upon Calvary is a triumph of religious conception and artistic painting. The whole scene is bathed in a wierd twilight atmosphere that adds greatly to the intense realism of the whole. In connection with this great Cyclorama is the famous painting, Christ's Triumphal Entry into Jerusalem. These two superb historic works are on exhibition at the corner of Wabash Ave. and Hubbard Court, Chicago, just two blocks south of the Auditorium. No advance of price we are informed, will be made during the world's fair and one ticket admits to both exhibitions. Intending visitors to Chicago should make a note of them.

Clean the Refrigerator.

One of the best pieces of advice that can be given to a housewife is to keep the refrigerator clean. Examine it daily. Scour it thoroughly at least once a week, and, during warm weather it is best to pour a strong solution of washing soda and scalding water through it as often as every three days. Clean the drain pipe with a brush, or a stiff wire wound at one end with a cloth, and do not forget to clean and scald the waste-water pan. After each cleaning or scalding the refrigerator should be dried. A very simple, effective way, and one which destroys any minute insects, is to burn paper in it, then air it well before putting back the things. Charcoal is the best and safest deodorizer to use. Place some in the corners of the refrigerator, keep it in the waste pan and in the receptacle for ice, and renew it occasionally. Never put anything in the refrigerator that will taint it, and be especially careful not to put fish, lemons, vegetables or meat in the same compartment with butter and milk.—Exchange.

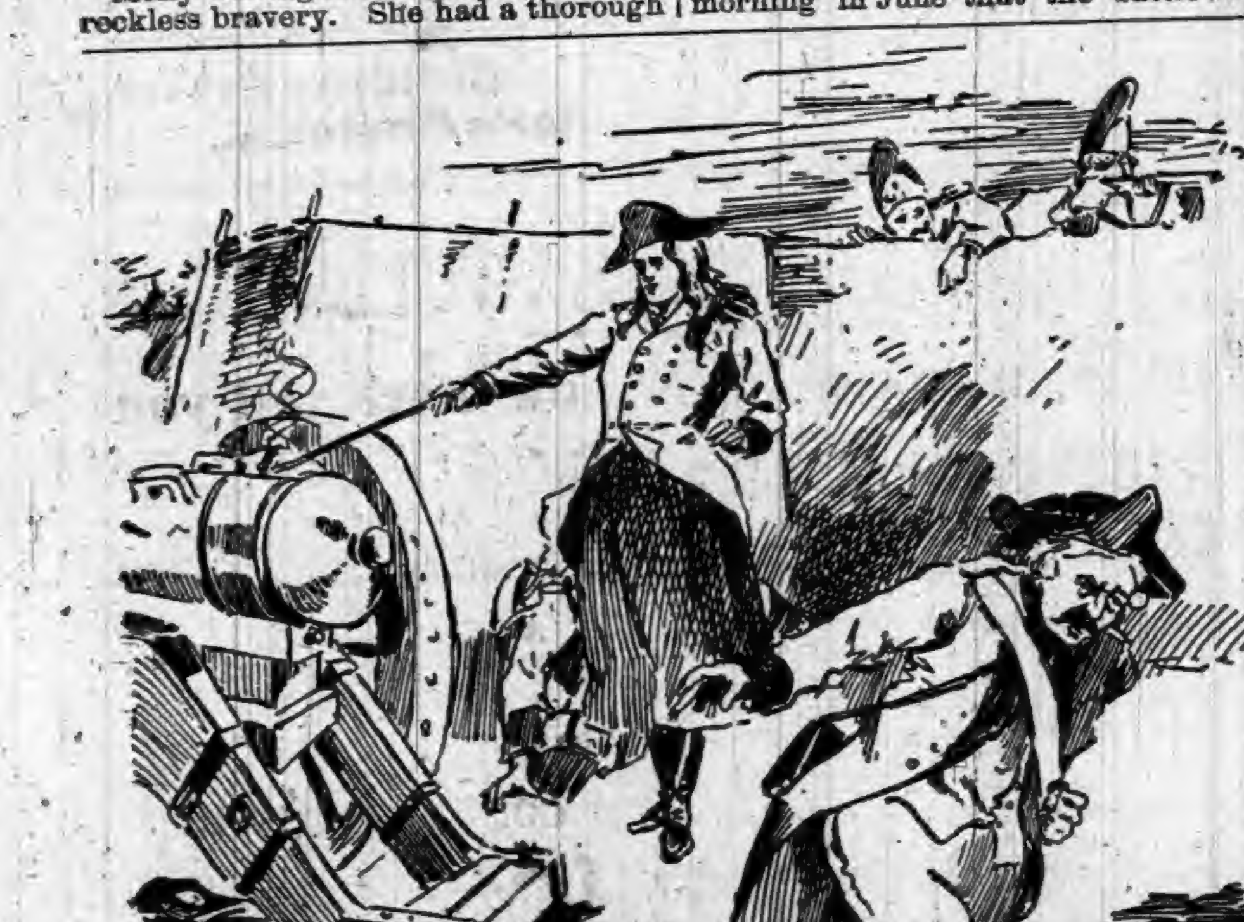
MOLLY PITCHER.

On the west bank of the Hudson, a few miles south of Buttermilk Falls, is the grave of Molly Pitcher, one of the most famous personages in the revolutionary war. She was the only woman whose name ever appeared on the payroll of the American army and her name was placed there by order of General Washington, in recognition of her services in various battles. Molly's maiden name, says a writer in the Utica Globe, was Mary Ludwig. She was a stout, freckle-faced, red-haired Irish girl. After her marriage to Larry O'Flarharty her husband went to the front as an artilleryman and Molly remained at home. She didn't stay separated from her husband long, however. On a Monday morning, after she had hung up her weekly washing and gone into a field near the house to pick blackberries, a horseman rode up and told her she must join her husband. Without a word Molly picked her still wet clothes from the line, rolled them up in a bundle, jumped upon the horse behind the man, and rode away. She attached herself to the command in which Larry served. She made herself useful by carrying water to the soldiers in a huge pitcher. This is the way she got her peculiar name.



'MOLLY MANS THE GUN.

Molly distinguished herself by her reckless bravery. She had a thorough contempt for cowards and a mighty sharp tongue. Larry lacked courage, and, consequently, he came in for constant abuse. But he was of a philosophical turn of mind and he accepted his matrimonial fate without paying any attention to his wife's sharp thrusts. Not so with the raw recuits of the command, however. The woman had a wonderful effect upon them. There wasn't one of them who wouldn't rather march right up to a cannon's mouth than receive a scornful glance from her. Because of her powerful influence over the men she became a privileged character. She adopted a semi-regimental dress. It consisted of a short blue skirt, the scarlet coat of an artilleryman and a cocked hat worn rakishly on one side. It was at the capture of Fort Montgomery and Fort Clinton that Molly first distinguished herself in the service of her country sufficiently to cause her name to be written in revolutionary history. Larry was manning a cannon in the latter fort in a puerile sort of a way. Molly hovered about him and the other fluttering spirits trying to prevent their remaining courage from oozing out. Word was passed that the terrible Hessians were advancing in vast numbers, almost to the demoralization of the garrison. If it hadn't been for Molly disaster would have swept over the fort quickly. She raised everybody's spirits by mounting the rampart and shouting: "Come on, Hessians or redcoats; we'll trait ye all the same, and'll put more bullets an' balls into yees than ye'll loike for supper." The enemy advanced upon the two forts simultaneously. They were evidently of the opinion that the resistance would be light. They soon discovered their error, however. Terrific fires were poured into them from both forts, causing them to fall back with fewer numbers. Again and again

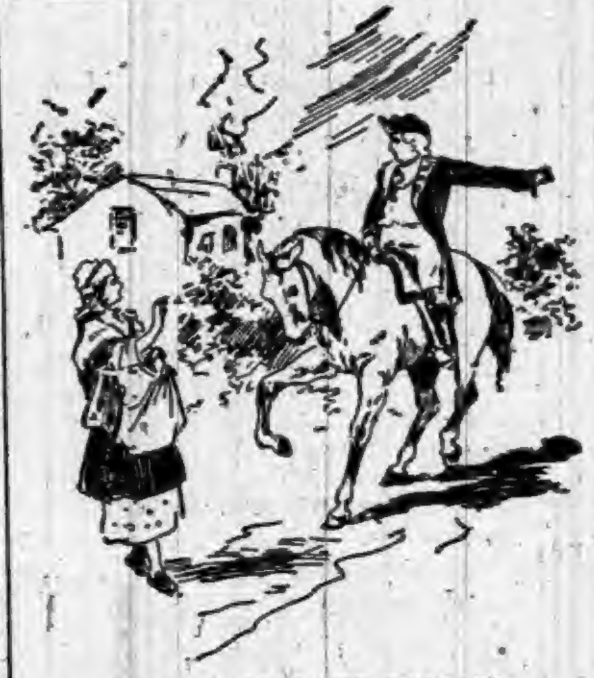
"Back, ye spalpeen!" she cried; "fire the gun."

She was addressing herself to the demoralized Larry, who was struggling in her grasp. He succeeding in freeing himself, and throwing down his portfire he cut and ran for it.

"Devil a shtep will I rin till that gun's fired," shouted Molly. Snatching up burning brand she touched off the last cannon that was discharged in Fort Clinton in the very faces of the enemy who were pouring over the rampart. In the momentary confusion that this audacious display of nerve caused, Molly made her escape.

At the Battle of Monmouth.

Nine months later the woman, then only 22 years old, was with Larry on the field of battle once more. It was Monmouth where the troops were massed this time. In that memorable battle Molly fairly outdid herself in displaying energy and enthusiasm. She flitted among the soldiers threatening, commanding. and cursing them as the they advanced and again and again they were repulsed. The forces of the enemy were too much for the garrison, however, and it become apparent after a time that the forts would be taken. When all was confusion in Fort Clinton, when the gunners had deserted their guns and the enemy was about to pour over the rampart, the shrill voice of Molly was heard above the uproar. occasion demanded. On the sunny morning in June that the battle was fought Molly was carrying water to the soldiers as usual, and occasionally making suggestions, which the officers tolerated from her as well. Shot and shell filled the air, mowing down row after row of soldiers. Larry was distinguishing the battery to which he was connected by his effective fire. It held a commanding position in full view of the enemy. The British gunners were trying their best to pick Larry down and finally succeeded. Molly was just returning from the spring with a pitcher of water. When within a few feet of her husband a fragment of a cannon ball found a mark in Larry, killing him instantly just as he was in the act of discharging the field piece. Mollie saw her husband fall. She dropped her pail, and with wild shrieks and groans threw herself upon his mangled remains. It was the first time Mollie had ever been seen to give away to grief, and the battery stopped firing temrorarily. There was no gunner to take faithful Larry's place at the field piece, and the officer in charge of the battery ordered its withdrawal. When Mollie heard this order she sprang to her feet, panting to avenge the death of her husband.



TOLD TO JOIN HER HUSBAND.

"No, yer honor!" she cried. "I'll take Larry's place, and it'll do me sore heart good to send some o' thim redcoats as killed him to the devil." And with a wild Irish yell she grabbed up the portfire and discharged the piece.

All that day, till the order came to retreat, Molly manned the gun, discharging it as fast as she could load it, her eyes lighted by a strange fire of anger her red hair dishevelled and flying. When the battery was finally forced to cut and run Molly refused to abandon the body of her husband. Lifting it up she tied it on the gun and dashed along beside it, the troops cheering her on all sides. The story of Molly's action spread like wildfire through the camp. On the following morning, all covered with dirt and blood, Gen. Greene presented her to Gen. Washington, who conferred the rank of a sergeant upon her. Molly remained with the army some time after the battle which made her a widow, but she was never the same again. She was an object of special admiration from the French officers. They never tired of hearing the wonderful stories of the daring exploits of the dashing Irish vivandiere. When she passed along the French lines occasionally, soliciting alms, she was greeted with volleys of "Bravo, madam!" while the crowns fairly rained into her hat.

After Larry's death Molly grew morose and sullen, and soon retired from the army. Before leaving, however, she received the distinction of captain by brevet, and on the recommendation of Gen. Washington her name was placed on the half-pay list for life. She went to West Point to live, being under the personal charge of the commandant there. She lived with various families thereabouts, the commissary at the post paying her board, while supplies of various kinds were sent to her direct from the Secretary of War at Washington. Capt. Molly associated exclusively with the soldiery, spending her days and evenings in the garrison, drinking and smoking and swearing with the best of them. Toward the close her life became far from well ordered. As the result of her riotous living she died in 1789.

The Glorious Fourth.

THE Chinese may be obliged to go, but young America will surely enter a loud and deep protest if the firecracker of the Chinese is not allowed to come; for the firecracker, the sputtering, fizzing snapping firecracker, with the red jacket and the gunpowder breath, is the basis of the youthful Fourth of July. Fiery rockets may cleave the starry heavens, brilliant Roman candles may spout their parti-colored balls into the night, and golden mines may pour forth their glittering displays, but the Chinese firecracker of commerce is dearer to the heart of the great American youngster than all of these creations of American manufacturers. The boy of the period firmly believes that the signers of the declaration of independence had the firecracker in mind when they affixed their signatures to that great document. The firecracker, to his youthful mind, is right in it. It embodies the sharp, short bark of freedom, and a Fourth without its resonant snap would be a dead blank. Long may the firecracker wave, then! Its flitting sparks kindle in the breasts of young America the fire of a glowing patriotism, and its explosions keep it ablaze. And, moreover, its occasional sting reminds that other little boy—he who came here from across the water—that he is in a land of the free. He will put his burned finger into his mouth and touch off another, just to express his joy at being in a country where freedom and the firecracker march hand in hand beneath the stars and stripes. The firecracker is a tightly rolled bit of patriotism that should be allowed to thrive for the lessons it imparts.

Ten Million a Year.

It would be difficult to estimate what it costs the American people every year to commemorate freedom. Of the 65,000,000 people in the country, there are at least 20,000,000 who celebrate. Suppose that the average that each one of these pays for fireworks, flags, etc., was placed at 50 cents, which seems somewhat low. That would make $10,000,000, which is probably as near to the total cost as any mathematician can get.

HOW TO CELEBRATE IN GRAND STYLE.

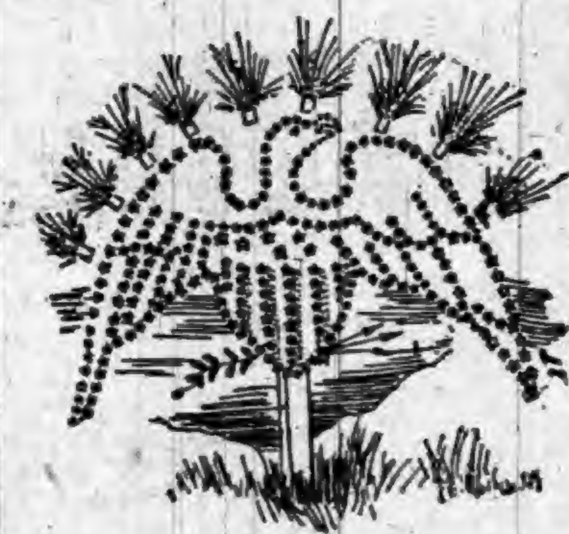
Samples of What the Modern American Patriot of Wealth Displays on the Nation's Anniversary—Pointers on How to Produce Pyrotechnics.

Fireworks on the Fourth.

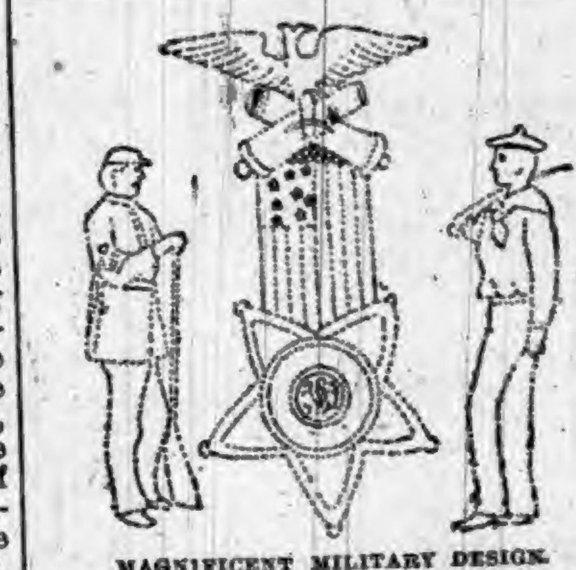
In this great year of Columbian fetes the man of wealth and fashion is going to make things noisy on the day and night of the 4th. I was recently given a glance at the order book of probably the largest fireworks manufacturer in the world, writes a New York correspondent, and I felt a strong inclination to go up in a balloon to witness the magnificent pyroramas which promise to illuminate New York suburban homes.

While at the manufacturer's I was given some interesting pointers on not alone the latest in the way of fireworks, but on how to arrange for fine pyrotechnic effects. The prettiest novelties for this season will undoubtedly be the Japanese day fireworks. The little top-shaped bombs are fired from mortars, or upright guns, and, exploding at a great altitude, will display life-size figures of some national celebrities, flowers of all kinds and colors and designs appropriate to this World's Fair year. The bombs are made in sizes of nine, twelve and eighteen inches circumference. I was told that the secret of their manufacture has never been betrayed by the Japanese, and that the American designs to go into the bombs were sent to Japan and redrawn there. They will be exploded on every lawn from Tuxedo to the Thousand Islands, and from Bar Harbor to Coronado Beach on the Pacific coast.

To arrange a fine display take plenty of room; as extensive a lawn as possible. Place your aerial fireworks in boxes far to the rear and covered with oilcloth or tarpaulin to prevent dampness or sparks from getting at them. Your rocket troughs should be erected well to the side of these covered boxes and fairly well to the rear of the lawn. Don't fail to erect them in a direction away from the spectators. Your bombshells must be fired a good ways from the crowd. Place the largest set piece in the center of the lawn and then distribute the other pieces in such manner and at such distance from each other that they may not set fire to one another while burning, the smallest pieces always being placed nearest the spectators. Colored fires, mines, fountains, aerolites, batteries, cissons and geysers should be placed in line in front of the display, each well away from the other. Balloons must be fired in that corner of the lawn where the breeze will be sure to carry them away from the inclosure at once. Begin your pyrotechnics with rockets, balloons, bombshells, and illuminations, then fire off your set pieces, commencing with the smallest, continuing with the larger, varying each display with aerial effects, and closing with the largest piece. The effect of this will be vastly enhanced by firing off a battery at either side. Now, one word more as to precautions. Always attach your lighting torch to a stick about six feet long.



AN EAGLE IN FIRE.

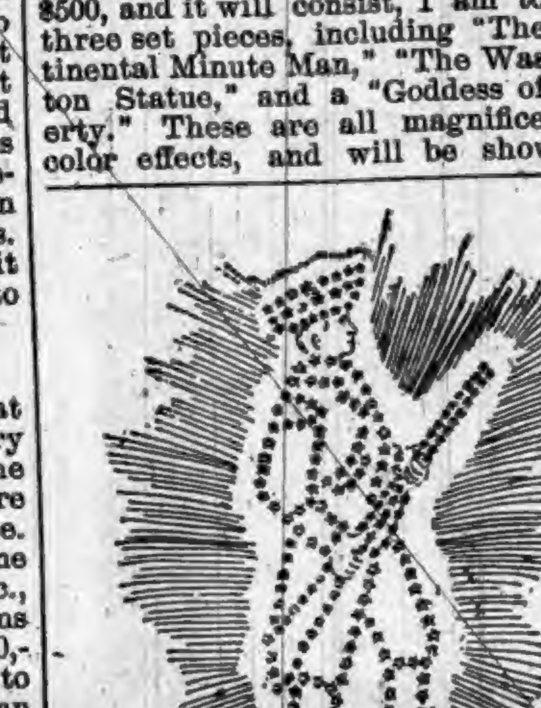


MAGNIFICENT MILITARY DESIGN.

Cost of an Elaborate Display.

What will it cost to make a display of this kind? Prices differ. You can spend $50 and have a very neat exhibition. But for $100 you can lay in a good supply of smaller pieces and at least one large set effect.

One of the prettiest displays will be that of Mrs. Van Rensselaer Cruger, at Idlewild. I don't think it will cost over $500, and it will consist, I am told, of three set pieces, including "The Continental Minute Man," "The Washington Statue," and a "Goddess of Liberty." These are all magnificent in color effects, and will be shown to splendid advantage on the magnificent Cruger lawn.



THE CONTINENTAL SOLDIER.

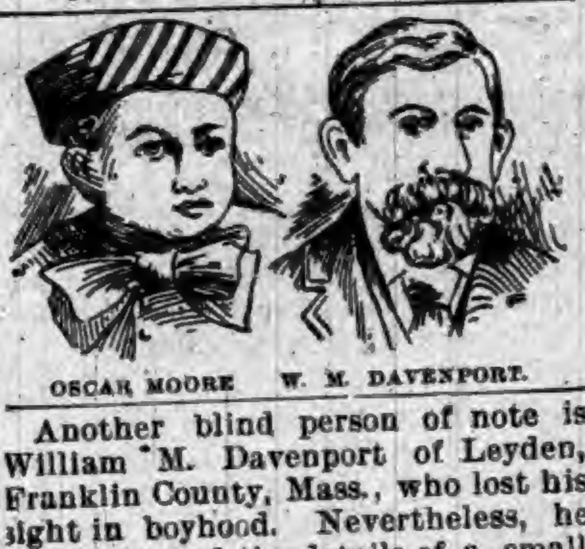
When you start out to order your fireworks be sure to order everything that is pretty, and here are a few of the things you must not fail to get: Boomshells in all effects, aerial bouquets, the Gatling battery, Spuyten Tuyfel sizzlers, sparkling waterfall, the shield of Iris, the polka redowa, Chinese brilliants, tree of liberty, the sunburst, Peruvian glory, elfin waltz, the aurora borealis, the casket of jewels, the magic wheel, the Egyptian pyramid, the double diamond, the revolving star, the puzzle wheel, the Italian rosette, the Mosaic diamond, the peacock tail, jeweled sprays, Saxon pyramid, dazzling diamonds, revolving gun, kaleidoscope, pleiades, gothic cross, basket of jewels, emerald jewels, and Niagara falls.

All of these are comparatively small in the setting and magnificent in the effect. The Niagara falls design is not costly and perhaps the prettiest of minor pyrotechnics.

TRIUMPHS OF THE BLIND.

How They Overcome the Disadvantage of Being Unable to See.

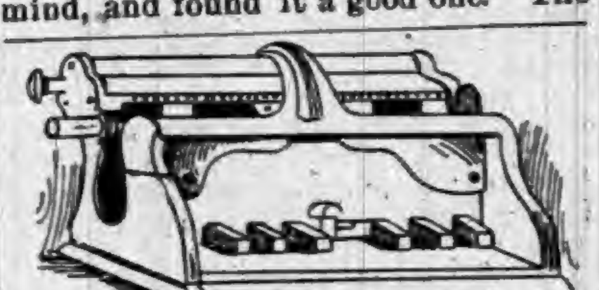
The achievements of the blind are an unfailing source of wonder to those who can see, and the latest prodigy among those unfortunates is Oscar Moore, a 6-year-old colored boy of Waco, Tex. His memory is not simply phenomenal, it is what many people would call marvelous. He has never been known to forget a name after hearing it once or to fail of recognizing a voice. It is a well-known fact that loss of sight sharpens the other senses, especially hearing, but it has not been supposed to greatly strengthen the memory.



OSCAR MOORE W. M. DAVENPORT.

Another blind person of note is William M. Davenport of Leyden, Franklin County, Mass., who lost his sight in boyhood. Nevertheless, he soon mastered the details of a small farm on which his parents lived, and, starting in early manhood with no fortune but his talents he has acquired over $50,000. He is one of the best judges of wool in the State, and by feeling and smell can detect every variation in fiber, grease, dirt, and other peculiarities. This, however, is not so surprising as his quick judgment on live stock. He does it by "laying on of hands," and does it so well that he is one of the regular judges at all stock gatherings.

Despite the compensations of nature and the labors of philanthropy this is a hard world for the blind, and, though ingenious men have sought out many inventions to aid them, much remains to be done. The development of Laura Bridgman by Dr. Samuel G. Howe was certainly the greatest achievement in physico-psychology this world has ever known. She was deaf, dumb, and blind, and had no sense of smell and an imperfect taste, yet Dr. Howe discovered a way to reach her mind, and found it a good one. The account of how he taught her to tell what she thought and felt is the very romance of humanitarian science.



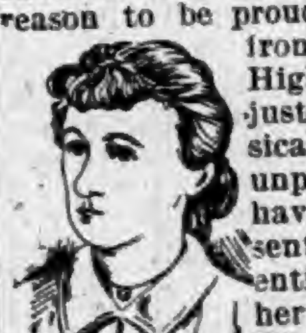
TYPEWRITER FOR THE BLIND.

Prof. Frank H. Hall, of the Jacksonville (Ill.) Institute for the Blind, has completed an invention on which he has been toiling for years—a typewriter for the blind. Without going into details, it is enough to say that this little machine removes at once all the enormous difficulties the blind have experienced in writing; that not only can the production be read by the blind when the puncturing system is used, but by the letter system the blind will be able to prepare manuscript for the press. Yet the machine is quite simple, having but six keys and weighing but nine pounds. They can be manufactured in quantities for $7 each, and the Professor has nobly refused to avail himself of any gains by a patent.

ILLINOIS AHEAD OF INDIANA.

A Fairbury Girl Who Was Neither Absent nor Tardy for Twelve Years.

Indiana is proud of its New Castle girl, who recently graduated with the high honor of having neither been absent from school nor tardy for nine successive years. Illinois has now reason to be proud of its graduate from the Fairbury High School, who has just finished the classical course with the unparalleled record of having never been absent or tardy for the entire twelve years of her school life. Miss Edna Ross, the young woman who made this marvelous record, was born Dec. 21, 1874. She started to school Sept. 12, 1881, and for twelve long years she has responded promptly to the call of the school bell, never failing in the thousands of roll-calls, and has faithfully met every requirement of her teachers. During her High School course she led her class, and easily carried away the honors of valedictorian, given for highest scholarship. The Board of Education recognized her faithfulness by presenting her with a handsome Maltese cross medal upon her graduation.



MISS EDNA ROSS.

The Last Resort.

Mrs. Armstrong was an invalid. For years she had been laid up with a lingering disease, yet with all her suffering she talked of her pains as lightly as if they were nothing at all. One day she had a visit from Mrs. Sampson, a broad-shouldered, big-hearted woman from Newberry street. After the usual commiserating questions had been asked Mrs. Sampson moved her chair closer to the little invalid and said:

"And don't you really know what it is that ail's you?"

Mrs. Armstrong smiled.

"No, I don't. The doctors don't know, either. To tell the truth I think nothing but a post-mortem examination will ever show."

Mrs. Sampson thought for a second. Then she said earnestly:

"Poor, dear creature. And you are so weak now that you will hardly be able to survive that."—Boston Budget

A Sinecure.

Sir Boyle Roche was a fine, bluff, soldier-like old gentleman, holding some post at the viceregal court, sitting for a government borough, and always voting faithfully for the "Castle." The debate one night was on sinecures, which Curran had indignantly denounced, and twitted by one of the opposite side on some personal inconsistency in the matter, he replied, hotly: "Sir, I am the guardian of my own honor." To which Sir Boyle neatly rejoined: "Then the gentleman himself has got a very pretty sinecure."

Snakes and the Geranium.

In South Africa, we are told, the geranium has the reputation of being a guard against snakes, which, it is said, avoid the plant as though it were poisonous. We are reminded that, though the flowers of the geranium are scentless, the leaves contain a quantity of volatile oil, with more or less pungent odors; and it is stated that no snakes will come near a bed of these flowers. A missionary in South Africa has surrounded his house with a cordon of geraniums, with the result that it is never visited by these unwelcome intruders. The discovery of this property in the geranium is attributed to the Kaffirs.

A Nice Nurse.

Parents who are in the habit of putting their young children out to nurse will do well to ponder over the following case recently tried in a police court at Paris: From the testimony it appears that a nurse woman was in the habit of giving a baby in her charge an artificially healthy complexion by cruelly painting the infantile face with cosmetics. The child progressed so nicely that its weight increased in an astonishing manner, owing, it is said, to some shot which the nurse placed in the baby's clothes. Finally the cruel fraud was detected, and the woman received two years' imprisonment.

Queer Passport.

The finest examples of unpleasant passports on record are, according to James Payn's way of thinking, those given by the King of Portugal when master of the Indian Seas. Even Moorish ships dared not set sail without his permission in writing, and as the Moors could never acquire the art of reading, these "permits," for which handsome payment, of course had to be made, generally ran as follows: "The owner of this ship is a very wicked Moor. I desire that the first Portuguese captain to whom this is shown may make a prize of her."

A Chance for Health

Is afforded those fast sinking into a condition of hopeless debility. The means are at hand. In the form of a genial medicinal cordial, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters embodies the combined qualities of a blood fertilizer and depurent, a tonic and an alterative. While it promotes digestion and assimilation, and stimulates appetite, has the further effect of purifying the life current and strengthening the nervous system. As the blood grows richer and purer by its use, they who resort to this sterling medicinal agent acquire not only vigor, but bodily substance. A healthful change in the secretions is effected by it, and that sure and rapid physical decay, which a chronic obstruction of the functions of the system produce, is arrested. The prime causes of disease being removed, health is speedily renovated and vigor restored.

A San Francisco Genius.

Joseph Schiesser has invented a steam sledge on which he thinks he will be able to reach the North Pole. The sledge is arranged with a number of steam arms, and these arms, when set in motion by the small petroleum engine on the sledge, propel the machine forward. The sledge is also provided with a small cabin for the voyagers, and a large tank to contain the petroleum used for fuel. Schieser thinks that he has solved the problem of polar exploration, and, having some property, intends to devote it to the purpose of getting farther north than white man has ever before gone.

TRADE WITH CANADA.

RECIPROCITY WOULD BE AN ENTERING WEDGE.

There's No Way of Arguing that Reciprocity Is Not Free Trade Within Certain Limits—Protection's Black Record—Governor McKinley's Challenge.

Want Freer Communication.

An "international reciprocity convention" has been held at St. Paul, Minn., made up of delegates from the United States and the Dominion of Canada, the object of which is to promote freer commercial intercourse between the two countries. The substance of its proceedings was the adoption of resolutions in favor of a new reciprocity treaty and the appointment of a joint committee "to bring the matter before the Dominion Parliament and the Canadian authorities and before the Congress of the United States and the American authorities and before the people of the two countries."

The matter has been before the legislative bodies, the authorities, and the people of the two countries off and on these many years, but the agitation is likely to be perennial until some result has been achieved. Freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States and Canada would be so obviously to the advantage of both that efforts to secure it are not likely to cease until the barriers are overcome. The strongest argument in favor of it is to be found in the constant object lesson of the unquestioned advantage of free trade between the States of this Union. Nobody disputes the advantage to all the States, and to the country as a whole, of unrestricted commerce between the different sections of the Union, and nobody can show wherein freedom of trade between New York and Ontario would be less beneficial than between New York and Ohio, or why unrestricted intercourse between Minnesota and Manitoba would be less advantageous than between Minnesota and Illinois.

While the logic of the situation is wholly in favor of reciprocity—the fuller and more complete the better—it is the ultimate consequences of that logic that present the greatest obstacle to the acceptance of a sound policy, since it militates against what each country has for years been pleased to regard as its "national policy." In short, the logic of the case pressed to its conclusions would leave the doctrine of protection without a leg to stand upon. What the resolutions of the St. Paul convention favor is "the free interchange of those classes of products, both natural and industrial, of each one that are most generally in demand or usually find the readiest sale in the markets of the other."

Obviously that is the kind of interchange that is most advantageous, but it is also the kind that would naturally take place if there were no restrictions in the way. If it would be mutually beneficial in the case of certain "classes of products," it would be so in the case of any or all commodities to the extent that the specified conditions existed, of a demand or ready sale in one country or the other. If it would be mutually beneficial in the case of Canada and the United States, it would be so in the case of any other countries to the extent that the products of one were in demand or had a ready sale in another. In fact, the logic is simply the logic of free trade between the States, which would have precisely the same force with reference to trade between any nations.

But it is this very interchange of the products of one country that are the "most generally in demand or usually find the readiest sale in the markets" of another against which the policy of protection is directed. The natural and most profitable and advantageous course of trade is just what it aims to prevent. Reciprocity is free trade within certain limits, and there is no way of arguing for it that will not tell in favor of extending the limits until nothing is excluded.—New York Times.

Protection's Black Record.

Wherever protection has been tried for any length of time it has shown its true fruits in low wages, pauperism and national degradation. China, with its immobile masses, stagnant, dead; Russia, prohibiting the importation of grain, and suffering famine in the south in spite of her rich agricultural resources in the north; the Ottoman Empire with its enslaved population, protecting itself by letting nothing go out of the country, a somewhat less dangerous policy than that of letting nothing come in; Spain, with her absurd tariff laws, "a whale stranded upon the coast of Europe;" England, groaning in 1840, and for very agony snapping her tariff chains, arising in 1846 renewed and stronger than ever in her pro-tariff days. On the other hand what of little Holland, in her freedom and free trade? Let another speak: "Though she produced not a bushel of wheat, nor a single plank, nor one bar of iron, she ate the whitest bread, made the cheapest and noblest ships, with the finest iron plating and strongest canvas of all European nations because her trade was the freest."

Yet the United States has protection, and is more prosperous than England, which has a kind of free trade, not yet wholly freed. True, but with only part of the factors any case may be made out. Anything may be proven if all the evidence for the other side is excluded. America is more prosperous because she has more free trade than any European nation. England is an island in the sea, scarcely larger than New York; America is a contnent. Continents can stand more protection, and stand it longer, just as large ships can carry cargoes that would sink your light-weight clippers. It is because we have so large an area of free trade that we can stand so large a measure of protection, and to make the case of America analagous to that of tariff-ridden Europe, every one of our States should have a tariff; against every other. Then, and then only, if we were prosperous still, would it be fair to attribute such prosperity to the tariff.—Joseph Dana Miller, in the Courier.

The Usual Way.

It is an interesting coincidence that the addition of 25 cents per ton to the price of anthracite coal, made by the agents on Wednesday, was immediately followed by a reduction of wages at the mines. There has been but one reduction of the price of coal since the combination began to be affected by the reverse which culminated in the collapse of the Reading Company, and this advance offsets half of the reduction then made. In spite of the decisions in New Jersey and the condition of the Reading Company, the combination seems to have some vitality remaining. It will not be so easy now, however, to maintain the fixed prices and to prevent underselling as it was six months ago.—N. Y. Times.

A Break in Bicycle Prices.

At last there is a promise of bicycles at reasonable prices. One of the great English makers has deserted the American trust, and has reduced prices from $150 to $85 and to $65 for an 1892 machine. As the average cost of a $150 wheel is only $30 it is not surprising that a few manufacturers have become suddenly wealthy and that within a year forty new bicycle shops have started in New England. By next year when the present 45 per cent. duty is cut into or entirely abolished, we may expect to purchase good machines for $50 or $60.

Sugar and Wheat.

The sugar planters of Louisiana may think they are not directly interested in the condition of the grain market, but it is true, nevertheless, that the prevalence of low prices for wheat is a matter which they cannot afford to ignore in the preparation of their arguments against a repeal of the law that gives them a bounty on the products of their plantations. Wheat of the standard grade was sold in Chicago on Friday for 66 cents a bushel, the lowest price recorded in the last thirty years, and we have heretofore pointed out the conditions which seem to preclude any considerable advance for some time to come.

If the sugar planter in Louisiana ought to be assisted by a bounty of 2 cents on every pound of sugar he produces, why should not the wheat grower be aided in the same way? If money procured by taxing the people of the United States ought to be given to the owner of a sugar plantation to increase his profits or to prevent him from producing sugar at a loss, why is not the owner of a wheat farm, who can make no profit, or very little, at prevailing prices, entitled to a bounty from the same general fund? And why should he contribute out of his earnings to the bounty that insures or increases the profit of the sugar planter, if no part of the sugar planter's taxes is used in paying to him a bounty on every bushel of his wheat?

The sugar planters may be sure that these are the questions that the wheat growers are asking in these days whenever the protests of the planters against a repeal of the bounty law are brought to their attention. And they are reasonable questions. We do not think the arguments of the recipients of the bounty ought to or can prevail against the answers which justice requires to be made.—New York Times.

Common Sense.

A story which might bring some comfort to badgered witnesses is told in connection with Colonel Fowler, one of General Shaler's staff. He was a clever lawyer as well as a good soldier, and he once fell into the hands of a fellow-lawyer, whose chief ability lay in the direction of abusing plaintiff's attorney, and confusing their witnesses.

On the occasion in question Colonel Fowler was on the stand to establish his signature to a document, and swore without hesitation that it was a genuine autograph.

"Now, sir," said the lawyer, with a threatening and impressive shake of his forefinger, "on your oath—on your oath, remember—how do you know that is your signature?"

"Well, sir," replied Colonel Fowler, unmoved by the man who was apt to make timid witnesses confused and even hysterical in some cases, "on my oath I don't know how I know that is my signature, but I know it."

The lawyer was a little taken aback by this calm reply, and before he could rally from his surprise the judge spoke up.

"That will do, counsellor," said he. "The witness is right. No man can know how he knows a thing of that sort, and the witness' answer has exhausted the subject. The human mind is incapable of analyzing its own action by which it attains this mysterious knowledge."

And so that cross-examination failed through the common-sense answer of Colonel Fowler to a question which hundreds of witnesses have tried to answer, with the sole result of leaving the jury under the impression that they were lacking in one of two qualities—truthfulness or intellect.—Youth's Companion.

Protection via Lower Duties.

The Iron Age believes in protection even while it is advocating lower duties. It says: "It cannot be denied that the greatest good of the greatest number calls for a reduction in some of our iron duties. But among the advocates of reduction there are some manufacturers who are thereby pushing other interests than those of the greatest number. Our manufacturers of agricultural implements have gone through the process of evolution that a protective tariff usually tends to determine. They prospered under the 35 per cent. duty until they became numerous and had to sacrifice profits. Failures followed, and prepared the way for combination, which duly ensued. Now the capacity of our big manufacturers of agricultural implements has outgrown the consuming caliber of the country, and to keep on growing it requires new markets. This gives a motive to the manufacturers in question for seeking reduction on bar iron, etc., that they may cheapen production and thus become eligible to compete for an export trade against the producers of other countries. In other words, while they retain internal protection in the form of high duties, they want external protection by lower duties."

Sugar Bounty Must Go.

New Orleans dispatch; It looks very much as if Louisiana's delegation at Washington now despair of retaining the bounty on sugar when Congress meets in the fall. Senator White has avoided committing himself on the subject so far, but his colleague, Mr. Caffery, who has just returned from the capital, says:

"Yes, I have talked a great deal in Washington with public men about the sugar question. I have drawn them into discussions of the subject. There can be no doubt whatever that the bounty is doomed. Whenever the people get a craze against a thing that thing must go. The craze now is in opposition to the sugar bounty, and its repeal is certain."

Mr. Blanchard, from the Fourth District, has expressed himself to similar purport, and it is understood that this fall the delegation will make little or fight against the repeal of the bounty, accepting the inevitable, and will concentrate all their efforts to obtain a protective duty of 1½ or 2 cents.

McKinley's Challenge.

Buckeyes are to be envied. They can again listen to debates on the tariff question. The Republicans have thrown down the protection gauntlet; in fact, they have resuscitated and thrown the only original McKinley into the ring, and there is no doubt that the Democrats will accept the challenge by nominating some radical Democrat like Johnson, Hurd, Harter, or Neal for Governor. Then the fun will begin and slugging matches and bull fights will have lost their charm. The bourbon element of the Republican party is on top, and why should not the Democrats put their radical element to the front—the same element that surprised even themselves last November by making their districts so strongly Democratic on the tariff question that Ohio lost its protection balance? Whenever the Democrats have aimed their heaviest guns at protection they have been victorious.

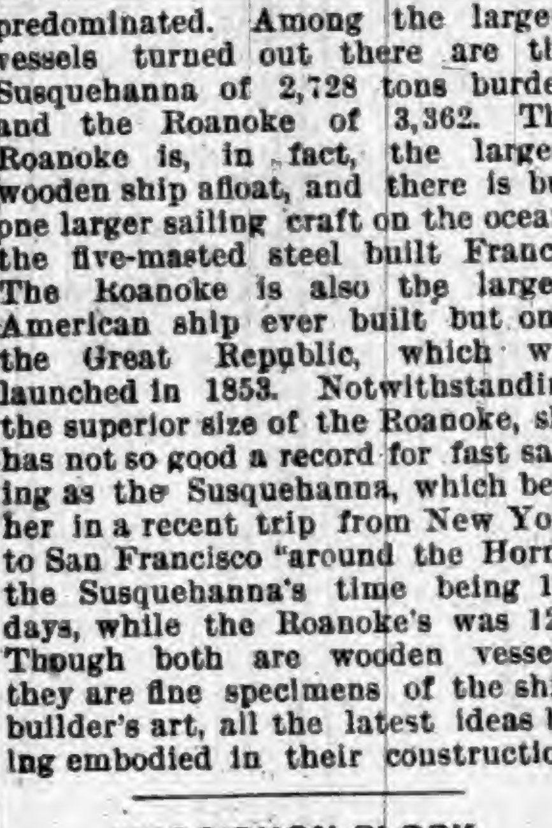
LAST OF WOODEN SHIPS.

Steel to Replace Timber in the Yards of Bath, Maine.

They will build no more big wooden sailing ships at Bath, Maine, the chief city of timber ship yards in the United States. The biggest yard there has just put in a steel plant, and steel ships will soon be produced. Bath is a shipbuilding city to the core and to the man. It was incorporated as a town in 1780, but ships were built there more than a century and a half ago, and though the industry has sometimes lagged sadly seagoing vessels have been launched from the Bath yards every year since the first keel was laid there.

Its site was fixed upon by the settlers with especial reference to its adaptability to shipbuilding. It is located some miles up the Kennebec, the shores of which between the city and the sea are rugged and abrupt. But at Bath there is not only enough comparatively level ground for a town of some size, but there the river broadens into what seems like a spacious bay extending along the city's front and northward for several miles above it. Bath itself is narrow and stretches along the river bank for three or four miles. Shipyards, docks, foundries and sawmills—all sorts of industries accessory to shipbuilding—crowd each other on the shore.



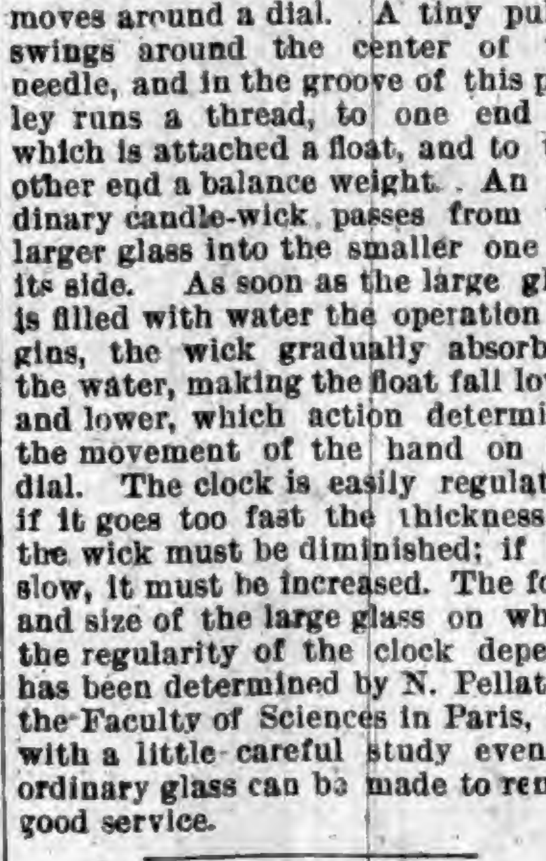
THE SUSQUEHANNA.

Time was when the majority of the craft launched from the yards of Bath were square rigged, but for some years fore and aft schooners of three and four masts have largely predominated. Among the largest vessels turned out there are the Susquehanna of 2,728 tons burden and the Roanoke of 3,362. The Roanoke is, in fact, the largest wooden ship afloat, and there is but one larger sailing craft on the ocean, the five-masted steel built France. The Roanoke is also the largest American ship ever built but one, the Great Republic, which was launched in 1853. Notwithstanding the superior size of the Roanoke, she has not so good a record for fast sailing as the Susquehanna, which beat her in a recent trip from New York to San Francisco "around the Horn," the Susquehanna's time being 122 days, while the Roanoke's was 125. Though both are wooden vessels, they are fine specimens of the shipbuilder's art, all the latest ideas being embodied in their construction.

THE SIPHON CLOCK.

How the Hour of the Day May Be Indicated by a Novel Contrivance.

A very interesting contrivance, that can easily be constructed by an amateur, is attracting attention in France. Over the top of two side supports or side arms a crossbeam is placed in the shape of a knitting-needle, which must be perfectly straight, of course, and connected at one end with a small hour hand that moves around a dial. A tiny pulley swings around the center of the needle, and in the groove of this pulley runs a thread, to one end of which is attached a float, and to the other end a balance weight. An ordinary candle-wick passes from the larger glass into the smaller one by its side. As soon as the large glass is filled with water the operation begins, the wick gradually absorbing the water, making the float fall lower and lower, which action determines the movement of the hand on the dial. The clock is easily regulated; if it goes too fast the thickness of the wick must be diminished; if too slow, it must be increased. The form and size of the large glass on which the regularity of the clock depends has been determined by N. Pellat, of the Faculty of Sciences in Paris, but with a little careful study even an ordinary glass can be made to render good service.



THE SIPHON CLOCK.

Pointer for Whist Players.

An expert mathematician once set himself the nice little sum of calculating the number of different ways in which fifty-two cards of a pack can be distributed among four players, thirteen to each, taking every possible combination and permutation.

It would be no use to present the answer here in a long row of figures, for no one can realize to himself what such a numerical array really conveys; nor would it be much better to play with the words billions and trillions, seeing that these are mere words and nothing more to most of us; but the following illustration is more likely to be appreciated by the ordinary reader:

If the entire population of the earth taken at one thousand million of persons, were to deal the cards incessantly, day and night, for one hundred millions of years, at the rate of a deal by each person a minute, they would not have exhausted the one hundred thousandth part of the number of essentially different ways in which the cards can be so distributed.

THE U. S. Government Chemists have reported, after an examination of scores of different brands, that the Royal Baking Powder is absolutely pure, of highest leavening capacity, and superior to all others.

Our Country and Other Countries.

How Many Knew.

Says Bill Arp in the Atlanta Constitution: I know a young man who was poor and smart, and a friend sent him to one of those schools up North, and he stayed two years and came back as a mining engineer and a bridge builder, and last year he planned and built a cotton factory and is getting a large salary. What a grand opening there is in this region for boys who have a mechanical genius, or have a fancy for minerals or for mining. How many college boys are there in this State who can tell what kind of native timber will bear the heaviest burdens, or why you take white oak for one part of a wagon and ash for another, or what timber will last longest under water and what out of water. How many know sandstone from limestone or iron from manganese. How many know how to cut a rafter or a brace without a pattern. How many know which turns the fastest, the top of the wheel or the bottom as the wagon moves along the ground. How many know how steel is made and how a snake can climb a tree. How many know that a horse gets up before and a cow behind, and the cow eats grass from her and the horse to him. How many know that a surveyor's mark never gets any higher from the ground or what tree bears fruit without bloom.

Two Old Sayings.

The expression, "putting one's foot in it" is by no means elegant, but so expressive that, sometimes, nothing else can take its place. It has an amusing historical origin. When the title to land is disputed in Hindostan, two holes are dug in the ground, and one leg of each of the lawyers of the rival claimants is buried therein. In this awkward position the dusky legal champions fall to arguing, and the one who tires first losses his clint's case. Thus in a very humiliating sense, both the losing litigant and the defeated lawyer have "put a foot in it." The expression "topsy-turvy" also originated in an odd way. When turf is used for fuel, it is laid out to dry with the right side down. Thus arose the phrase, "top-side turf-wise," pronounced "topsy-turvy," and meaning "upside down."

Electric Light Bug.

With the introduction of arc lights in the South have come numerous bugs of more or less dangerous species. One in particular that is worthy of notice has been termed the electric-light bug. It is about an inch and a half long, and from a sixteenth to a quarter in thickness, and seems to consist wholly of legs and wings. They have hitherto been considered harmless, but now it is believed they bite or sting with direful results.—Electrical Review.

Regularity.

Regularity in feeding and caring for poultry is very essential to success. Kindness, also, will find a reward. Never allow your fowls to be frightened by any unnecessary noise or bluster. Fright or worry will surely decrease the amount of eggs hens will lay and retard the growth of young fowls.

Facts Are Insolent.

Oliver Wendell Holmes it was who said that "Absolute, peremptory facts are bullies, and those who keep company with them are apt to get a bullying habit of mind. Scientific knowledge even in the modest men has mingled with it something which partakes of insolence."

CUPID is never pictured as anything but a little baby, because love never lives to grow old.

Only One Chance.

It is customary to say that the circus of to-day is the same as the one of twenty years ago, but it isn't; it isn't as good. The old-time circus had only one ring, and you could see all that was going on without doing violence to your eyes. But with three rings you miss half the fun. While you are looking at the athletes in blue tights in one ring, the athletes in red tights in another ring are sure to break the world's record, and you hate yourself because you didn't see them do it. You go away from the show with a mist of tears in your eyes and a great gnawing pain at your heart, and you wish, oh, you wish that you could see a one-ring circus again before you die. But you will never see it in this world, gentle reader, unless an extra session of Congress is called in July.—Washington News.

In Borneo.

Charles Hose, an explorer, recently made a trip up the Baram River, in Borneo, and noted several strange customs practiced by the natives. One night he slept in a native house, and, upon awakening, was surprised to find at the head of his bed a large box, which proved to be a coffin. On inquiry he learned that the coffin contained the mortal remains of the chief's late wife. He found that it was the custom of these savages to keep a corpse in the house for three months before burying it.

THERE is more Catarrh in this section of the country than all other diseases put together, and until the last few years was supposed to be incurable. For a great many years doctors pronounced it a local disease, and prescribed local remedies, and by constantly failing to cure with local treatment, pronounced it incurable. Science has proven catarrh to be a constitutional disease, and therefore requires constitutional treatment. Hall's Catarrh Cure, manufactured by F. J. Cheney & Co., Toledo, Ohio, is the only constitutional cure on the market. It is taken internally in doses from ten drops to a teaspoonful. It acts directly upon the blood and mucous surfaces of the system. They offer one hundred dollars for any case it fails to cure. Send for circulars and testimonials. Address, F. J. Insure Against Sickness.

Are you insured? If not, now is the time to provide yourself and family with a bottle of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhœa Remedy as an insurance against any serious results from an attack of bowel complaint during the summer months. It is almost certain to be needed and should be procured at once. No other remedy can take its place or do its work. 25 and 50 cent bottles for sale by Robbins & McCord.

Teacher—What is meant by the expression, "mother tongue?"

Boy—It means that the old man doesn't have much to say at home.

Don't Travel Without It.

Dr. M J. Davis is a prominent physician of Lewis, Cass county, Iowa, and has been actively engaged in the practice of medicine at that place for the past thirty-five years. On the 26th of May, while in Des Moines en route for Chicago, he was suddenly taken with an attack of diarrhœa. Having sold Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhœa Remedy for the past seventeen years, and knowing its reliability, he procured a 25 cent bottle, two doses of which completely cured him. The excitement and change of water and diet incident to traveling often produce a diarrhœa. Everyone should procure a bottle of this Remedy before leaving home. For sale by Robbins & McCord.

"Let's break the silence," suggested one patriotic boy to another on the morning of the glorious Fourth.

"We can cracker, anyhow," replied the other.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WATERLOO.

Mrs. Faust from beyond Orland, is with her daughter, Mrs. Huber for an extended visit.

Mrs. Carpenter is at this time enjoying a visit from her mother, Mrs Hill of California, Mich.

Mrs. Gen. Blair has been very poorly for some days, but at present seems to be somewhat easier.

Your correspondent feasts to-day on green peas, and in a day or two will be enjoying string beans, all so much better for coming from the home garden.

Dr. and Mrs. Bevier have the only grandchild in the family visiting them. She is the only child of their oldest daughter Mary, who married and lives in Ohio.

Tuesday evening the L. M. C. held the last meeting before vacation, at the home of Florence E. Waterman. This is also the last meeting of the Chautauqua four years course.

Mrs. Fred. Shwenk from Sandusky, O. has been visiting her sister Mrs. George Braun for some days. She is at the present time with her two children, visiting other relatives.

Mrs. Sarah Williams who has been suffering so long from cancer, died Saturday morning. The funeral was held at the house, on Monday afternoon at 2 o'clock, and she was laid in our pleasant cemetery for her long rest.

Sunday was children's day in the U. B. church, and in the evening a very interesting entertainment was given in which as usual, those taking part, did wonderfully well. They never make a failure, and always draw a crowd.

Katie Braun is in Chicago where she has been about ten days. She will probably remain six weeks, perhaps longer, as she is very pleasantly situated, to take her time visiting Jackson Park, as well as the many attractions Chicago offers outside of that.

Mrs Winslow, has her store and everything therein, made spick, span clean, and in complete order. Mrs. W. is now engaged in marking goods, preparatory advertising her stock of drugs for sale. In the meantime, she may be found in the store, ready to wait on customers, and sell all goods at the lowest rates.

Sunday morning Mrs. Huber and Mrs. Faust were riding, when in turning, the horse turned so short as to throw the occupants out, and the top buggy upside down on top of them; the horse probably was frightened, and kicked himself free and ran with the thills. Strange to say no one was seriously hurt, although the ladies both were much bruised, and some cut, and will no doubt feel the effects for days. The horse was brought back all right, but the buggy is a wreck.

WATERLOO.

LAST WEEK.

E Shoemaker's daughter Maud, with her children are home with her parents.

Mr and Mrs. J. C. Boyer go to Chicago this week for a few days intending to go again, later.

The extra railroad gang has been laid off within a few days, and three or four hundred men at once thrown out of work.

Saturday evening last the W. R C. gave a strawberry, ice cream and cake festival. The evening was pleasant and the ladies were kept busy supplying the wants of their many visitors.

A month ago, as the weather became suitable, a number of circular, raised beds were prepared on the railroad grounds at the station, and filled with variety of geraniums, and other suitable blooming and foliage plants. The shrubbery set out earlier in the season seems all to have lived, and is now in bloom and looking well. The spot is transformed into a very attractive place.

Holton & Company exhibited in Waterloo Wednesday afternoon and evening of last week. Those who attended, speak of the performance as having been good, with some new features introduced. Mr. Belford, came forward to state to those present, his disappointment, in not being able to perform, here where he is so well known but a week before, an attempt to rob him while asleep was made, which awoke him, his assailant cut, and hacked him with a razor until he became unconscious from the loss of blood.

Mary Kelley, who has been ill for some months with that dread disease, consumption, died at her mother (Mrs. Adams') home in Auburn last week Wednesday. The funeral services were held Friday morning in the Presbyterian church in Waterloo, which was beautifully decorated by Katie Braun and Nettie Chamberlain with flowers. Rev. G W. Healy preached the sermon, and conducted the services, by Miss Kelley's request. A large audience assembled, very many from the country. The deceased was buried in our beautiful cemetery.

The present prospects for fruit, do not seem very favorable, although almost all fruit trees were loaded with blossoms. Peaches, apples and quinces formed in abundance, but some sort of insect life, worked at the peach leaves until they shriveled up, dried and fell, the peaches the size of filberts or larger, having no leaves to protect them from the sun, soon fell also. The apples also fall in vast number, for some different reason, and now your correspondant discovers, the quinces as large as hickory nuts of good size, are turning yellow and shrivelling up.

He spent last Sunday with friends in Butler.

Our authorities have put in a fountain at the water works building, that will be a thing of beauty, when completed and in operation. They have also put up two drinking fountains on Broadway, from which a good cold drink of the best water in the world can be had at all hours of the day or night. They are well patronized.

Funeral services were held at the family residence last Sunday conducted by Rev Freyberger, of the Lutheran church of this place. Her remains were interred in the east cemetery. And so he bent his loving smile.

Judge Taft's Decision.

EDITOR COURIER: The COURIER of the 1st instant contains a statement on its first page under the heading of "Communicated" which needs improvement so as to not do an injustice to TRUTH, whose argus vigilance detects falsehood and demands accuracy and equitable fairness. The writer does not give his name, and hence a correction of his falsehood of statements will be given in quotations from Judge Taft's decision I presume the COURIER will observe the same rules of discussion which control other papers of the land, and close our communications, except to "use and explain," with this article.

The writer said that the Radical bill "averred that no change could be made in the constitution without two-thirds of the whole society."

Now, let Judge Taft answer the question as from the next to the last paragraph of his learned decision. Here it is:

"Without therefore considering any of the other questions raised, it is sufficient to say that the vote of fifty thousand in a membership of two hundred thousand, without notice full and ample to the entire church, could not constitute a request of two-thirds of the whole society, within the meaning of the constitution and would render the adoption of the new and amended constitution wholly invalid."

Where now is the statement of the correspondent who claims the Liberals have gained the first count?

He continues to misrepresent by saying that the Radicals "Declared that the appointing of the commission was illegal, and hence all its acts null and void"

Not a word, as quoted, is supported by the protests of the Radicals The statement does them an injustice which the writer cannot afford to leave uncorrected.

Germane to this point the learned Judge says:

"The next question is whether the acts of the majority in the conference of 1885 and in the conference of 1889 were violations of the original compact or constitution of 1841 As averred in the bill, I am clear that they were. * * * * Article four is a limitation both upon the general conference and upon the right of the majority of the members to change the original compact"

Now where is the second count, and to whom does the Judge give it?

The writer is now suddenly converted and admits that the Judge decided that "a conspiracy by the majority existed," and that the election was "null and void."

There, we have it,—The Judge gives us all three counts, and our proofs are ready to support them before any court in the country. The Watson vs Jones, 13 Wall, 679 upon which the Liberals depended, is set aside by Judge Taft. He says, "He says, "I do not think that the case of Watson vs Jones controls the case presented in this bill. He adds "We do not understand the supreme court in Watson vs Jones to hold that an open and avowed defiance of the original compact and an express violation of it, will be taken as a decision of the supreme judiciary which is binding on the civil courts."

Respectfully,

Rebecca Wilkinson, of Brownsvalley, Ind., says: "I have been in a distressed condition for three years from nervousness, weakness of the stomach, dyspepsia and indigestion until my health was gone, I had been doctoring constantly with no relief. A Sad Death.

Can you describe anything worse than a young person dying by inches with consumption, cut off in the bloom of youth, when bright prospects of happiness and prosperity are before them, a very sad death indeed. Is it not a fact that most cases of this kind are brought on by a cough, only slight at first, then more violent, followed by night sweats and a general breaking down of the entire system. These are cases in which people are to blame. Why not check this slight cough. Dr. Marshall's Lung Syrup is guaranteed to cure, it will prevent consumption. Use it before it is too late. By Druggists, 25, 50 and $1.

The sum of 12 cents has been received by the U. S. Treasurer, to be placed to the credit of the conscience fund, from a man who says he violated the postal law in using postage stamps twice.

Dr. Marshall's Lung Syrup has reached the top shelf. There is nothing that equals this medicine for coughs, colds, asthma, bronchitis or any affection of the throat or lungs. It has been thoroughly tested for this class of diseases, and stands in the front rank at the head. This medicine is guaranteed to give satisfaction, who could ask for more. Give Dr. Marshall's Lung Syrup a trial; it has cured others and will cure you. Do not fail to use this in time. Price 25, 50 and $1, by all druggists.

AUBURN AND VICINITY.

Some Reminiscences of its Early Days and Pioneer Citizens.

1871—Continued.

J. S. Ferdon, of Jackson, Mich., had established a furniture store in the old building that stood opposite the Auburn House and had conducted the business but a short time when in the fall of 1871, he sold out to C. C. Shaffer who continued in the same building for three years, wh en in 1874 he erected the brick store on Main St., which he has occupied to the present.

W. H. McQuiston located in Auburn in August '71, and with the exception of a few months' absence from our town has been in business here ever since. He came from Ft. Wayne and established what at that time was known as the Ft. Wayne store, on the corner now occupied by the Kiblinger block, carrying on a dry-goods and grocery business. Subsequently he disposed of the stock of groceries to I. N. Cool, who remained in that building, McQuiston moving the dry goods into the brick building, now occupied by the hardware store of Messrs. Brown, Boland & Culbertson.

Mr. McQuiston went to Walkerton, Ind., but soon returned to Auburn when he associated himself with George Ralston, our present sheriff, who was then in the grocery business and the two branches of drygoods and groceries were reunited. M. F. Long purchased Ralston's interest and the firm of McQuiston & Long having in their employ George Lanning and Charles Weaver, conducted a good business.

Finally the firm dissolved partnership, Mr. Long removed to Butler and Mr. McQuiston having disposed of his stock became interested in the Church Furniture Company, bought residence property in the immediate vicinity of the plant and has been identified with that important manufactory to date.

George W. Gordon, prominent in grand army affairs and officiating a second time as postmaster of Auburn, purchased in '71 Griswold's picture gallery and for a long period, gave his attention to photography with personal credit for superior work and consequent satisfaction to the public. His postoffice is a model convenience and the mailing facilities are excellent.

Although the field was neither as extensive nor the patronage as promising as desirable, yet it was sufficient to induce I. W. Bard to attempt to supply with milk such of Auburn families as did not keep cows and his milk wagon run this year was the pioneer in the trade.

The time for a milk route had not yet come. There were too many town cows as farmers knew to their cost. When a farmer came in with produce, he could not leave his load, but that cows watching would seize upon hay or other fodder, brought in to feed his team, and carry it away giving rise to the complaint:

"I cannot stir a single step, I cannot leave my load, but all my hay, my stalks and bags are whisked into the road." With fenceless yards and absence of intrusion, residents of to-day cannot realize to any extent the anoyance caused by stock running at large in the streets and the great advance in public opinion during the last few years on this subject.

The town was plentifully supplied with professional men and of physicians there were seven. Jared Spooner had associated himself with J. B. Casebeer, T. J. Matheny one of our best citizens and long a member of the town board, had come from North Benton and J. J. Littlefield from Monroe, Mich., and entered upon practice; but while not as healthy as at present. this locality was illy calculated to enrich the medical class.

Better success attended their co-adjutors, the druggists of whom the town had two skilled in their calling. John H. Ehlers and Frank E. Davenport carried on stores; the former in a two storied building just north from Seventh street on Main, east side and the latter in a framed structure that occupied the site of the present building. Ehlers erected a good brick store building opposite his old stand, married Mary Ward, daughter of the Elder and prospered. He died some years ago and his widow has a wide reputation for devotion to works of charity and philanthropy. Davenport disposed of his framed building to D. D. Moody, who moved it south of the public square and fitted it up for a law office and on the vacated site, Mr. Davenport put up the fine brick building he still occupies and in which he has known only success. Albert Totten became associated with him in 1871, but later re-disposed of his interest, removed and has been forgotten.

In August, J. L. Davis had effected arrangements with a New York bank to furnish citizens with drafts payable in that city thus marking the pioneer movement in the line of commercial facilties for our business men and by Oct. 1st, Auburn had been placed in telegraphic communication with Ft. Wayne.

As a flood tide for a time carries with it inert matter whose accumulations sinking as it ebbs form bars to obstruct a channel, so the men of enterprise inspired all classes to do something for the town of which they were residents but found difficulty in clearing the way for desirable improvements. There were property holders with exaggerated estimates of the new value of real estate who declined either to improve their property or to part with lots or lands for any reasonable price. There were many valuable building sites that would speedily have been occupied by needed and permanent improvements could they have been acquired for prices near their actual worth. But owners refused to sell and would-be purchasers failing to acquire desired vocations went elsewhere and the lots remained in a ruinous or vacant condition for years, useful neither to themselves nor the public.

Although these sites were preserved for the erection thereon of more costly and substantial structures in later years by this course, it was in 1871 a difficult matter with which to contend by those who labored to build up the town. It was a subject of deep regret and some feeling that enterprises failed on account of the exhorbitant prices at which fine locations were held when capital was available to build upon them. The spirit long extant which repelled improvement, crippled a progress it could not kill and depressed the hopeful, has vanished when it could no longer delay progress, for Auburn grew and prospered in spite of it.

Worthington's Magazine for July.

"The Poetry of Henry Timrod," by Eliza Calvert Hall, is a paper of much literary value, since it will introduce to hundreds of readers a poet almost unknown, though of our own country. Even in his own Southland the name of Timrod is the name of a stranger, and his slender volume of verse is rarely found on library shelves, although his work is remarkable for its grace, nobility, thoughtfulness and literary finish. Had he lived and worked to the full limit of matured powers, he would have become more completely a poet of the people, than, perhaps, any of our poets have yet become; but he died early, and without the recognition that would have been been so dear to him. No sketch of him, either biograpnical or critical, has appeared in any magazine, English or American, so that even posthumous fame seems to be denied to one who has been called the best of Southern poets, not even excepting Sidney Lanier. The short stories and poems of Worthington's Illustrated Magazine for July are fully up to the standard, and the Departments contain a number of well-chosen articles that deserve careful reading. "Our Young People" has a most excellent story and the tastes of the little ones, the housewives, the puzzle lovers, and those who delight in out-of-the-way bits of information, have been admirably provided for. Taken all in all this Magazine is especially adapted to the varied requirements of the American family, and as such may be safely recommended to all who desire bright, wholesome, pure and helpful reading.

A Famous DeKalb Boy.

Recent daily papers are noticing the romantic wedding of Mr. J. H. Stiefel, formerly of Angola, now a noted painter and better known by his adopted name of "Caliga." His bride is a niece of the poet Whittier. The family formerly lived in Auburn. Mrs. Hodge, who knew them, says that in 1849, Joseph Stiefel and Aaron Wolf started a dry goods store here. Both were young single men. When they married, they brought their wives here, and here their childred were born. So, that the now famous painter, Caliga, is a DeKalb man. Many of our people saw some of his paintings at the art exhibition in Chicago a few years ago, and will remember their excellence. His people live at Angola now, and he returns every summer to visit them. Auburn people will, we believe, be interested to read the following extract from the Ft. Wayne Journal:

"A special from Danvers, Massachusetts, appeared in the Chicago Herald of yesterday as follows:

Yesterday morning, under the roof tree of her parental home, Miss Phœbe Woodman, the favorite niece of the poet Whittier, was made Mrs. J. H. Caliga, in the presence of a small company of intimate friends of the happy couple. The romance thus happily ended is one of recent origin, Mr. Caliga never having met his pretty bride until the past winter. It was a case of love at first sight on the part of the handsome painter, and their acquaintance ripened speedily into an engagement. The bride is comparatively small in stature and figure, and is of a delicate, gentle type of beauty. She is not a pronounced brunette, although her hair is dark and her eyes of a quaker gray. She is a woman of very charming ways. Mr. Whittier was very much attached to her and showed his fondness in many ways. She was the subject of his poem, "Little Red Riding Hood." The groom is a well known artist and the marriage will be a surprise to his friends.

Mr. Caliga is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Steifel of Angola, and a brother of Mrs. Louis Wolf, of Ft. Wayne. While in Italy pursuing his studies Mr. Steifel adopted the Italian for Steifel, which is Caliga, and he is known only by that name in his profession."

Polishing the Silver.

Since so much sterling silver and plate enters into some part of the table-cutlery it is necessary that one should also keep in mind the best methods of treating it, writes Maria Parloa in an article on "The Care of Cutlery and Glass" in the June Ladies' Home Journal. A perfectly safe substance for cleaning this metal will always be found in French whiting. For all ordinary purposes such whiting, wet with water, is all that is necessary: but if the silver is very much discolored it should be wet with alcohol. This will give a brilliant polish. It is important that the materials used to clean silver should be perfectly free from any gritty substance. The whiting should be sifted through a hair sieve or a piece of muslin, to insure against anything that might scratch the plate. Silver, as well as steel, must be washed perfectly clean before being rubbed with the polishing material. A soft silver-brush will be required for brushing the chased and repousse work, which is found on nearly all the silver-handled knives. Only substances which are well known have been suggested for the cleaning and care of the various articles spoken of.

Newspaper Law.

The new postal law now in effect makes the taking of a newspaper and refusal to pay for the same a theft, and any person guilty of such an action is liable to criminal proceedings, the same as if he had stolen goods to the amount of the subscription.

OUR NEWS SUMMARY.

A PENNSYLVANIA LADY BURIED ALIVE.

A Locomotive Fireman's Heroic and Thrilling Act—Sad Drowning at Fort Wayne—Suffered for Another's Crime—Aged Couple Hurt.

A Locomotive Fireman's Heroic and Thrilling Act.

Martin's Ferry (Ohio) special: Fireman Simms, of the Cleveland and Pittsburgh freight train, is to be presented with a gold medal for the heroic rescue from a horrible death of the bright 3-year-old daughter of John Row, proprietor of the Tiltonville Pottery. The child got away from home with her baby doll carriage, and, getting on the railroad track, was on a bridge, when the train rounded a sharp curve. The child saw the train but was so frightened she could not move. The quick eye of Simms took in the state of affairs, and, springing to his feet, made his way over the engine, arriving just in time to grasp the child's clothing and get her out of the road when the train dashed by. The child's mother and a number of friends saw the impending danger, but were powerless to render aid, and when the noble rescuer handed the child to the almost frantic, but overjoyed mother, she fainted dead away.

Public Debt Statement.

The monthly public debt statement issued from the Treasury Department, shows a considerable reduction in the debt and a slight increase in the gold reserve during last month. There was an increase of $897,136 in the net cash balance or surplus, and a decrease of $321,112 in the non-interest bearing debt, while the interest bearing debt increased slightly—$1,990—making a net decrease in the debt of $1,217,258. The gold reserve to-day is $95,485,413, or $436,773 more than it was a month ago, and the Treasury surplus to-day, including this gold reserve, is $122,462,290. The total debt to-day, less the Treasury surplus, is $838,969,476 made up in round numbers of $560,000,000 four per cent. and $25,000,000 two per cent. bonds and $376,000,000 of non-interest-bearing debt. Treasury gold assets to-day aggregate $188,455,432, against which there are gold certificate demand liabilities outstanding amounting to about $93,000,000, leaving the gold balance, as before stated, about $95,500,000.

Suffered for Another Man's Crime.

Recently a man giving his name as Louis Trowbridge walked into the office of Chief of Police Harrigan of St. Louis, and asked to be arrested. He is a self-confessed forger, and has been free for eight years, while another man has been suffering for his crime. Eight years ago Trowbridge, then a San Francisco lumber merchant, forged a note for $1,800, using the name of Warren Jones, banker, at Eureka, Cal. He got the money on the note from James Harmon. Harmon was arrested, convicted, and sentenced to five years in the penitentiary. Stricken with remorse, he now gives himself up.

Buried Alive.

Charles Boyer of Morrisons, Luzerne County, Pennsylvania, showed signs of dementia about nine months ago. His wife died, and he declared that she had been murdered. To satisfy him, the body was disinterred recently. The relatives were horrified to find every evidence that the woman had been buried alive. The body lay in the coffin face downward, the glass in the lid was broken and the hands had torn the shroud. The husband seemed pleased at his discovery, and he has been more rational than for a year. The body was reinterred.

Sad News Awaits Her.

At Fort Wayne, Alfred, the 19-year-old son of Prof. Zucher of Concordia College, was drowned while bathing with a number of young friends. It was several hours before the body was recovered. A sad feature of the fatality is that the boy's mother is on the Atlantic Ocean, en route to Singapore, India.

To Fight at Roby.

James Corbett has signed an agreement to fight Charley Mitchell at the Chicago Columbian Athletic Club rooms, at Roby, Ind., for a $45,000 purse. Three hours later Mitchell cabled his acceptance. The fight is to a finish between the 1st and 20th of December, 1893.

Died During the Music.

Miss M. E. Sweet, the oldest lady teacher in the Laporte, Ind., schools, died suddenly of apoplexy. She was attacked while attending a concert of the Indiana Music Teachers' Association.

Aged Lady's Fall.

Mrs. McMahon, an aged lady of Anio, Ohio, fell down stairs and received injuries which are considered fatal.

Aged Couple Hurt.

At Gallipolis, Ohio, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Schenk, two well-known and aged citizens, were caught by a freight train while crossing the Hocking Valley track and seriously injured.

Killed in a Collision.

In a rear end collision on the Lake Shore road, at Hudson Lake, near Laporte, Ind., William Pull, brakeman, of Mishawaka, Ind., was instantly killed.

Value of Our Silver Dollar.

Secretary Carlisle received a cablegram stating that the price of silver in London was 68¼ cents per ounce, at which rate the silver dollar as bullion was worth 53 cents. Nevertheless the point is, of course, apparent that the purchasing power of the silver dollar with silver bullion at 68¼ cents per ounce is as great today as it was when silver was worth $1.22 per ounce and the bullion value of the silver dollar was 93 cents. It should be equally obvious that this is so because it is known that the credit of the United States is behind its silver money, as it is behind all of its other forms of money and without which none of them, except gold coin and gold certificates, would be worth their par value in the money markets of the world.

AN EXTRA SESSION.

Congress Called to Assemble August 7.

President Cleveland has left Washington for Buzzard's Bay, Mass. Before leaving he issued a call for Congress to assemble in extra session, August 7. The determination to call the extra session the first week in August instead of the first week in September, it is understood, was only definitely arrived at at a recent Cabinet session, after giving full weight to the numerous telegrams received from all parts of the country, urging this course. Another consideration which caused the President to change his mind was forshadowed in the remark made by one of his cabinet officers a few days ago, that if the President received reasonable assurances that there was a likelihood of a prompt repeal of the so-called Sherman silver purchase law he might be disposed to call Congress together earlier than he had announced. It is inferred from the fact that the President has done so that he considers he has obtained the assurance he desired. Most of the cabinet officers have followed the President's example and left the city or are leaving the city for brief vacations. Those who remain say the President's proclamation speaks for itself and decline to discuss the situation further.

FORCED AND UNNATURAL

Is the Present Financial Situation.

Cincinnati special: The committee appointed by the Board of Trade and Transportation to inquire into the cause of the present financial crisis and report the same, responded with a report as follows:

1. That the present financial stress is forced and unnatural.

2. It is caused by a distrust of silver currency.

The committee urges the speedy convening of Congress and suggests as a remedy:

1. The repeal of the Sherman silver bill.

2. That national banks be permitted to issue bills to the full face of their bonded securities.

3. That the Government substitute for the present silver currency, silver coinage equal to its face value in gold.

The committee recommends the general organization of a trade board to press this matter on Congress.

KILLED BY TRAMPS.

A Railroad Crew Attempt to Eject Tramps, and the Conductor Is Killed.

Four tramps were put off a train on the Michigan Central Railroad near Dowagiac, Mich. A general fight ensued, and the conductor, Charles Foster, was shot by one of the tramps and fatally wounded. The tramps escaped, but everything possible will be done to secure their arrest. The men are described as follows: No. 1 is a negro, about five feet seven inches high, and wore a dark plaid coat and vest, light colored pants, tan colored shoes and left ear had been bitten at some time. No. 2 is about six feet tall, slimly built, dark suit of clothes and brown hat. No. 3 is dark complexioned and wore dark clothes and blue shirt, five feet seven inches high, medium build, and had four fingers of his left hand cut off, and had sandy mustache. Foster has since died.

Lost Treasures.

There is considerable excitement in Knobnoster, John County, Missouri, over the search that is being made there for the $1,500,000 in gold supposed to have been buried there by Spaniards many years ago. Tradition says that the Spaniards were conveying the gold from Mexico to Boonville for shipment on the river to New York, when they were attacked by Indians, and while making a defence they buried their treasure. On the spot where debris of the wagons had been found, excavations were commenced last week, and the work has been prosecuted vigorously ever since, but so far no trace of the gold has been found. The searchers are confident that they are on the right track.

Western Kansas Farmers Sorely Afflicted.

Topeka (Kas.) special: Governor Lewelling is in receipt of a large number of letters from Western Kansas requesting him to call an extra session of the Legislature to afford relief to the drought stricken farmers. He says that until he is convinced that a majority of the people are in favor of a special session he will decline to make a call. He is of the opinion that it will be cheaper for the people to raise the money necessary by subscription, than to pay taxes to defray the expenses of a thirty day session. The railroads will be asked to help.

Refused One-Half Million.

A Chicago special of June 30 says the owners of No-to-Bac, a proprietary medicine sold under an absolute guarantee to cure the tobacco habit in every form, have met with such wonderful success that a syndicate offer of one-half million has been refused. It is said that their sales are enormous, and that there is hardly a drug store in this country and Canada but what sells it. They differ from any other proprietary concerns in the fact that they promptly refund money when No-to-Bac fails to cure.

Threatened With a Johnstown Flood.

East Liverpool (Ohio) special: A feeling akin to consternation was created here when it became known that the lower reservoir situated on the hillside thirty-five feet above the eastern part of the city was in imminent danger of collapsing. The reservoir contains about 3,000,000 gallons of water, and should it burst would involve destruction to a number of manufacturing establishments. The situation is growing momentarily more critical, the water pouring from a rapidly growing fissure in the wall in torrents.

Silver Depressed.

The Mollie Gibson mine at Aspen, Col., the largest silver producer in the State, has closed down and will not resume operations until the outlook for silver is improved. All the big properties in that place have reduced their forces, nearly 500 men being discharged. A meeting of mine managers will be held in Denver to consider the situation and take some concerted action. Smelters have ceased buying ore and will confine themselves to that on hand or contracted for.

The German Elections.

Berlin special: Reports received from Kissingen, Schwienfurt, and Lohr, complete the returns from all 397 electoral constituencies of the empire. Of these 397 deputies, 199 are counted for the army bill, and 185 against it. Thirteen are classed as doubtful.

The Nord Deutche Allemaine Zeitung, calculates that at the opening of the reichstag, 205 deputies will favor the army bill and 191 will be opposed to it.

A Young Couple Drowned.

A double drowning occurred at Watertown, N. Y., on Black River. At a popular resort known as Glen park, Walter Darling, aged 21 years, son of a widow who resides at Brockville, was in a boat with Miss Abi Wooley, his sweetheart, aged 16 years. They allowed the boat to pass under the bridge and near the falls. Suddenly the boat capsized and they were thrown into the water. Both were drowned.

Captured the Town.

Valparaiso special: General Salegado surprised the garrison at Carpinterce and captured the town after routing the Third Infantry. General Sarava is marching toward San Berja. His troops had an unimportant skirmish with a small Castilhista force. It is said that the revolutionists are preparing for a final campaign, in which the movements of their troops are to be directed by two German army officers, whose services have been secured by the revolutionary committee in Montevideo.

The Year's Accounts.

Treasury officials are closing up the vast money accounts of the Goverment for the fiscal year 1892-93. The figures which will be officially proclaimed soon, will show, in round numbers, that the total receipts of the year are $385,000,000, while the expenditures are $383,000,000, leaving a surplus of $2,000,000. This was the estimate submitted by Secretary Foster to Congress as a probable surplus for the fiscal year, and the results prove it to be prophetically accurate.

Ohio Prohibitionists.

The Ohio Prohibition State Convention nominated the following candidates: Governor, Rev. Gideon P. Macklin of Germantown; Lieutenant Governor, S. H. Ellis of Warren County; Treasurer, Abraham Ludlow of Springfield; Attorney-General, S. E. Young of Portage; Supreme Court Judge, J. A. Gallagher of Bellaire; Dairy Food Commissioner, S. B. Todd of Wakeman; Member of Board of Public Works, E. H. Brosius of Stark County.

A Case of Double Poisoning.

A case of double poisoning, and one which has resulted in the death of one person and probably that of another, took place at Red Key, Ind. Joe Wagner and his wife quarrelled. Wagner procured a bottle of something and after drinking from the bottle asked his wife to do the same. She did as her husband requested and soon afterwards died in convulsions. The young son of Wagner was afterward made to drink from the bottle and is very low.

The Naval Militia.

The Navy Department is doing everything within its power to stimulate the development of the naval militia, and especially in States along the lake border. Secretary Lamont has approved the allotment of arms, ordnance stores, quartermaster's stores, and camp equipage to the militia of the States and Territories. The appropriation of the $400,000 allotment was the same as last year.

Terrible Act of Insane Convicts.

A terrible tragedy was enacted in the State penitentiary at Puebla, Mex. Two convicts, named Cayetano Oliveres and Marcelino Garcia, made an attack upon a number of fellow prisoners in the corridor with shoe knives, killing three of them and wounding seven others. It required the efforts of several guards to overpower the two convicts. They are said to be insane.

A Cyclone in the South.

Memphis special: A cyclone swept across the eastern portion of Arkansas, leaving destruction in its path. All telegraph wires west of Memphis are down and details are meagre, but it is known that the loss to property is enormous. The cyclone struck Little Rock, unroofing houses, wrecking building, and prostrating wires.

Train Robber Caught.

A passenger train was held up near Brackenridge, Texas. The fireman was killed by the robbers. But two passengers were on the train, both heavily armed. One of the robbers took to the brush, the other, a man named J. D. May, was captured by Conductor Steele.

Drexel Dead.

Philadelphia special: A private cablegram received at Drexel's banking house states that A. J. Drexel died at Carlsbad, Germany. The message stated that he had a slight attack of pleurisy, but recovered and was then seized with apoplexy, from which he died.

Cargo of Chinese Landed in Oregon.

Secretary Carlisle has received a telegram from Portland, Ore., announcing the arrival there of the Haytien Republic, with 500 Chinese aboard. The vessel was seized by the United States treasury agents.

Failure at Richmond, Ind.

Haynes, Spencer & Co., of Richmond, Ind., manufacturers of school and church furniture, has made an assignment. The liabilities are $59,500 and the assets $60,000.

Given the Prize.

John Berry, the cowboy who was the first to arrive at the Wild West show in the great race from Chadron, Neb., was awarded the first prize of $1,000 by the committee.

THE FERRIS WHEEL.

IT IS THE LANDMARK AND NOVELTY OF THE FAIR.

Visitors Ask Their First Question When They See It from Afar—How It Is Made and What It Cost—Arrangements for Carrying Passengers.

Away Up in the Air.

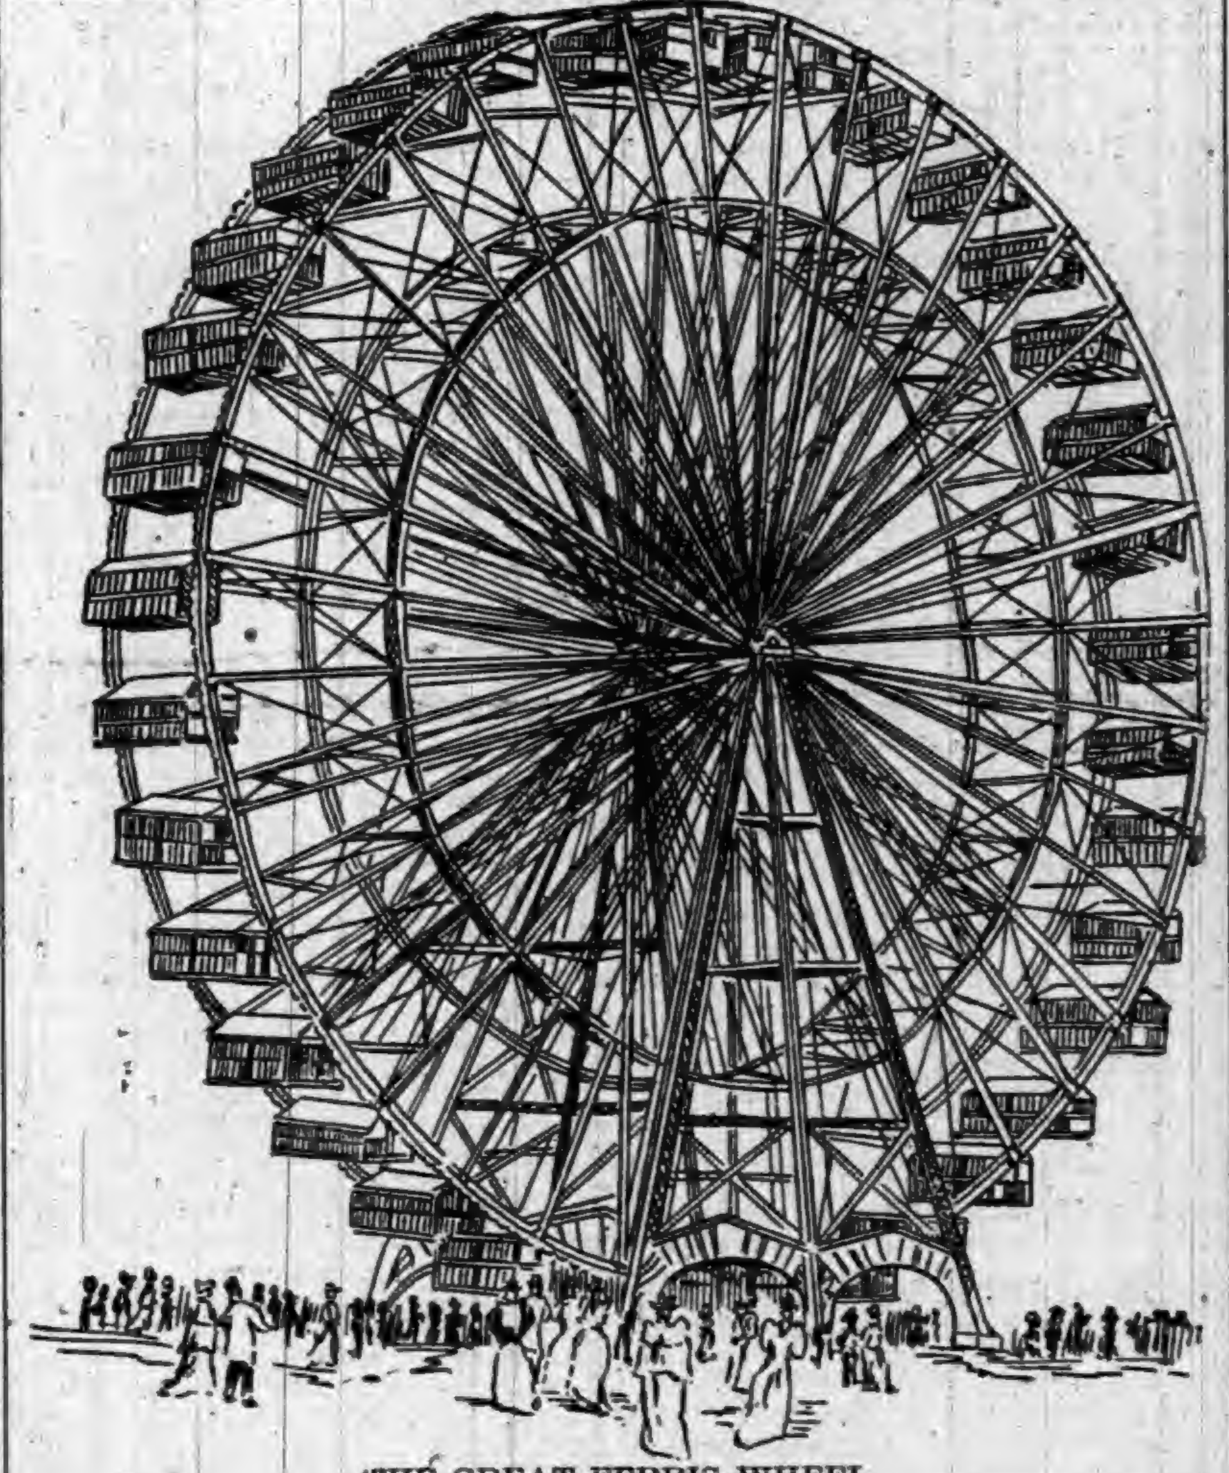
World's Fair correspondence:

"What on earth is that?"

This is the astonished inquiry that every passenger on the Illinois Central, the "L," and the steamboat lines on the lake makes as soon as he gets his first sight of the Ferris Wheel. And he asks it afar off, for the wheel is the landmark of the Fair.

His inquiry should be, "What in the air is that?" for if there is anything on or near the Exposition grounds besides the captive balloon that is not on earth it is the Ferris Wheel. At first it looks as the great trusses of the Manufactures Building used to look before the roof was on. But, as it towers higher and is seen to be circular instead of semi-circular, the spectator can form no idea what it is until he is told. It is beyond all question the crowning novelty of the Exposition as the Eiffel tower was of the Paris Exposition. To that it is superior in some respects, for it has the element of motion instead of being an inert mass, and presents engineering difficulties with which man never before grappled. When was made the first wheel similar to this in construction, in a general way, and for amusement purposes, no one knows. The idea is an old one. But the gigantic toy on the Midway Plaisance was born two years ago in the mind of George W. G. Ferris, a 36-year-old Pittsburg engineer.

The wheel is composed of two wheels of the same size connected and held together with rods and struts, which, however, do not approach closer than twenty feet to the periphery. Each wheel has for its outline a curved, hollow, square iron beam 25½x19 inches.



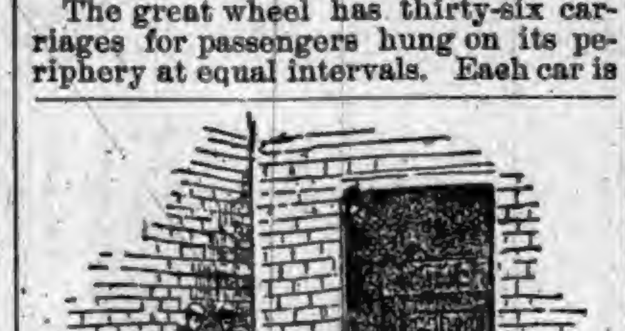
THE GREAT FERRIS WHEEL.

At a distance of forty feet within this circle is another of a lighter beam. These beams are called crowns and are connected and held together by an elaborate trusswork. Within this smaller circle there are no beams, and at a distance there appears to be nothing. But at the center of the great wheel is an immense iron axle 32 inches thick and 45 feet in length. Each of the twin wheels, where the axle passes through it, is provided with a large iron hub 16 feet in diameter. Between these hubs and the inner "crowns" there are no connections except spoke-rods 2½ inches in diameter, arranged in pairs, 13 feet apart at the crown connection. At a distance they look like mere spider webs, and the wheel seems to be dangerously devoid of substantial support.

The explanation of this is that the Ferris wheel—at least inside the smaller crowns—is constituted on the principle of a bicycle wheel. The lower half is suspended from the axle by the spoke-rods running downward, and the upper half of the wheel is supported by the lower half. The only difference is that the Ferris wheel hangs by its axle, while a bicycle wheel rests on the ground, and the weight is applied downward on the axel.

How Passengers Are Carried.

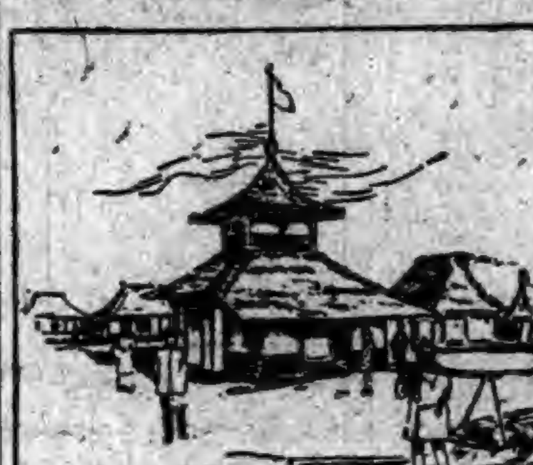
The great wheel has thirty-six carriages for passengers hung on its periphery at equal intervals. Each car is twenty-seven feet long, thirteen feet wide, and nine feet high. It has a heavy frame of iron, but is covered externally with wood. It has a door, and five broad plate-glass windows on each side. It contains forty revolving chairs, made of wire and screwed to the floor. It weighs thirteen tons, and with its forty passengers will weigh three tons more. It is suspended to the periphery of the wheel by an iron axle six and one-half inches in diameter, which runs through the roof. It is provided with a conductor to open the doors, preserve order, and give information. All the cars together will carry 1,400 people. To avoid accidents from panics, and to prevent insane people from jumping out, the windows will be covered with an iron grating. It is probable that one car in six will be reserved for smokers.



EGYPTIANS BOWING BEFORE THE TOMB OF THE SACRED OX.

The wheel, with its cars and passengers, weighs about 1,200 tons, and therefore needs something substantial to hold it up. Its axis is supported therefore on two skeleton iron towers, pyramidal in form, one at each end of it. They are 40x50 feet at the bottom, and 6 feet square at the top, and about 140 feet high, the sides next to the wheel being 40 feet and perpendicular, and the other sides slanting. Each tower has four great feet, and each foot rests on an underground concrete foundation 20x20x20 feet. Cross-bars of steel are laid at the bottom of the concrete, and the feet of the tower are connected with and bolted to them with iron rods.

The wheel is never left to itself, but is always directly and constantly controlled by a steam engine. The wheel points east and west, and the engine, which is a 1,000 horse-power reversible Blooming train engine, is located under the east half of it, and sunk four feet in the ground. The machinery is very similar to that used in the power-houses of the cable car companies, and runs with the same hoarse roar that they do. It operates a north-and-south iron shaft, twelve inches in diameter, with great cog wheels at each end, by means of which the power is applied at each side of the wheel.



JAVANESE "MISSIGIT" OR CHURCH.

How to Get on Board.

It is arranged to empty and refill six cars with passengers at a time, so that there will be six stops in every revolution. Accordingly six railed platforms of varying heights have been provided on the north side of the wheel and six more, corresponding with these, on the south side of it. When the wheel stops each of the six lowest cars has a platform at each of its doors. The passengers step out of the south doors and other passengers step in at the north doors. Then the next six cars are served the same way, and the next and next all day.

Preaching at the Fair.

Rev. Dr. Thomas, facing an audience of 5,000 persons in Festival Hall, preached the first sermon within the gates of the Columbian Exposition. He called the attention of his hearers to the text, taken from the twenty-first verse of the seventeenth chapter of St. John: "That all may be one; as Thou Father art in me and I in Thee; that they may be one in us; that the world may believe that Thou hast sent me." The service was made musical by the help of the Apollo Club, 500 strong. Dr. Thomas said in part: "Man stands alone in himself. He is self-conscious of his being; this being carried up to the point of self-consciousness is now dealing with all kinds of truths—the standards of truth as established by different races as their intelligence dictated. Conscience is the same everywhere. Conscience tells us to do what we think is right, and what is not right. The prayer of Christ was that all these people be one and they eventually will. It is only by labor that the masses can be enlightened and we must have teachers and objects for all these to profit by, for they are needed to make the world." Dr. Thomas then reviewed the constructive era of the Fair and told how the present beautiful city of white palaces had been erected in what was three years ago a marshy waste. It took all kinds of labor to reach this result, he said, and added: "We are all one person working toward one common end. Man is the helper of man. Notwithstanding the queer talk over religion considered in its multifarious beliefs, at the bottom of all great religions who have bibles and temples all believe one fundamental principle and that truth is somehow that man is so like God that it is possible for human and divine to come together. Men shall yet be one."

CAMP TAMPA'S ELEANOR.

An Arizona Romance, Written for This Paper.

BY THE DUCHESS.

CHAPTER II.—Continued.

"It is my openion," says Jim, "that our fellows have made a big blunder. The prisoners will only be a burden to us. Beef would have served our purpose better."

"You're right, Jim," says Black Sam. "Confound the stupidity of those fellows! We have money enough, and, after I get well, we can afford to set up as gentlemen in any city in the world. What sort of people are these prisoners?"

"An army officer and a young girl."

"A young girl," repeats Sam with a frown. "Of all accursed things!"

"To tell you the whole story, it's Col. Lorley and his daughter. Ned thinks he ought to pay $5,000."

"Curse Ned and his opinions!" growls Black Sam with an oath. "Colonels in the regular army don't ever have so much money as that. But they do have soldiers a plenty, and when this one gets loose he'll set a regiment to hunting us down!"

"Perhaps not. There's been queer goings on at Camp Tampa. The garrison deserted in a body to go digging for gold. The Colonel wouldn't give the boys a vacation—so they took it. Then the miners thereabouts got mad because Lorley wouldn't consent to their staking claims on the post grounds, and last night they mobbed him and his daughter out. Our fellows came across them and have brought them here. That's the whole story."

The captives are led into the cave blindfolded. Following them are the three freebooters, with a leer of triumph on their faces. The bandages are removed and the two pairs of eyes flash indignantly.

"Are you Colonel Lorley?" asks Black Sam.

"Yes," is the answer; "and have I fallen into the hands of Black Sam?"

"You have that pleasure. But I am not overjoyed to see you and your daughter here. I'd rather my men had brought in a couple of sheep. But we can't safely let you go. If I wasn't laid up with this cursed broken leg I'd soon solve the problem. Let me think it over. In the meantime, you and your daughter remain here!"

"But think——"

"I'm thinking—of my own safety. Your comfort is a secondary consideration."

"My people will search for me."

"But as long as you remain here there's no danger of their finding you."

"Well, Sam," says Ned, "what shall we do?"

"There's no hurry, comrade," replies Sam. "It will be time enough to-morrow. You and the boys take your ease; drink hearty if there's any whisky left, and lie around outside like real gold diggers. If anybody comes to inquire about the Colonel and his daughter you know what to answer."

"By the way," says Black Sam, with a malicious sense of fun, "we have another visitor from Camp Tampa. I mean Surgeon Brannard."

"He is here!" Eleanor exclaims.

"If he had not deserted us," says the Colonel, severely, "there would have been two men instead of one left in camp to defend it."

"You're too hard on him," Sam interposes. "He came to set my broken leg, and we've made him stay. In point of fact, Colonel, he's a prisoner, as you are."

For the moment Eleanor forgets her own plight in her gladness that Arthur Brannard is not a deserting soldier, a recreant lover, or a cowardly man.

CHAPTER III.

SMALL BUT ACTIVE WARFARE.

It is midnight, and Eleanor has not been able to sleep. She and her father have been provided with a crudely partitioned corner of the cavern as quarters. The Colonel, tired out by the day's exertion and adventure, is slumbering soundly. Suddenly the girl hears pistol shots outside. Then all is still. A quarter of an hour goes by and there is no further disturbance. The girl peers cautiously into the main apartment. Nobody is there except Black Sam lying on his couch. He is not only asleep but is breathing heavily. She approaches him and sees at once that he has been drugged. An empty vial smells of morphine. Where is Arthur Brannard? She has not seen him since she was brought to the cave, and she guesses rightly that he has not been informed of her captivity. Another of her correct surmises is that it is he who has administered a somnolescent draught to Black Sam. She cautiously takes a lantern and makes her way through a narrow break in the rocks, which she hopes may lead out of the cave. After groping along for some time she reaches a point where there are several passages. Trusting to luck, she takes the one nearest at hand, but soon finds herself obliged to turn back. A second gives no better results. The third, however, brings her in a few moments to the open air. Pressing on, she runs against a thick growth of roots and vines, which effectually conceals the entrance to the robbers' den. With some difficulty she makes her way through this obstruction, and finds herself in the narrow gorge, which is dimly lighted by the rays of the moon. This secret entrance is only a few paces behind the tent.

There is a light within the canvas, and the sound of voices. Eleanor creeps closer and listens.

"I don't believe we hit him," Jim is saying. "He was on a horse and away quicker'n lightning."

"And when the chief wakes up and finds out the Doctor is gone," says Ned, "he'll raise blue blazes."

"The thing for us to do," says Jim, "is to chase the Doctor back to Camp Tampa, kill or capture him, and burn the barracks. He'll be alone there tonight. He doesn't know that the Colonel and Miss Lorley are here. Whatever we do there before morning will be laid to the miners, who mean to clean out the place anyhow. So, let's be off, and get back again before the chief rouses from the dose I caught the Doctor giving him."

Eleanor hides behind a tree and stays there until the three men, joined by six others, arm themselves, mount mustangs, and gallop away toward Camp Tampa. She knows they will follow the circuitous route of the creeks, and she thinks that, by going afoot directly across the hills, she may possibly get to the camp ahead of them. But there is not a moment to lose in preparation or irresolution. To re-enter the cave might be to encounter a member of the gang and be detained. So she sets out at a gait which she hopes to maintain for the mile and a half which she has to traverse while the gang is going three or four by a roundabout route. Not once does she slip or stumble, though the ground is treacherous. Not once does she lose heart; but, young and strong and agile as she is, in spite of her slender frame, flies, straight as an arrow from its bow, to the rescue of him she loves. In the loneliness and darkness of the hour, with fear fighting in her breast for mastery over hope, she acknowledges to herself for the first time that she does, indeed, love Arthur Brannard; that he and he alone of all the world is the one man for her. How lone she seems that night! How full of ghastly terrors! Now a rustle in the shrubs on her right hand makes her blood run cold, and now a fancied whisper brings a frightened sob to her throat. And now at last the outlines of the barracks fall upon her straining eyes. Encouraged by them to fresh exertions, she runs as though Hecate herself were at her heels, never drawing breath until she stops at the gateway.

She finds the gate unfastened. The young officer has not been within more than five minutes, and he is scarcely through with his search for inmates. He meets her. Seeing him, all at once such a sense of security overcomes her that losing sight of the courage that hitherto has sustained and upheld her, she sways forward, and would have fallen but that he catches her in his arms.

"My darling, you here! What has happened?" cries he, in great agitation.

Then she conquers the faintness, and, raising herself from his embrace, sinks into a chair. She tells him in a few and hasty words of all that has happened; that the bandits may be momentarily expected; that the mob of miners will probably arrive at daybreak; that his life is in danger from the former; and that they must try to escape at once.

"I think I hear horses' hoofs now," she exclaims. "Come," with nervous haste, "another five minutes may make it too late."

"By Jove! so it will. You must mount my horse, and ride to Clayville."

"But you will come with me?"

"I can't go with you," says he, turning crimson. "I must remain here."

"Oh, you shall not!" cries the girl, vehemently. She lays her little white hands, one crossed upon the other, on his arm, and looks with eager eyes into his face. "I pray you to come; will you refuse me?"

"Will you make me a greater coward than you already deem me?" returns he, hastily, the late wound still rankling. In a moment, seeing how she shrinks away from him, conscience-stricken, he curses himself in his heart for having thus upbraided her.

"Forgive me," he says in an agony of contrition.

"You do right to reproach me," returns she, in a low tone, with her pretty head bent down and lips quivering, "although in my heart I never meant what I said."

"I believe that," he says, gladly. Then, with a sudden thought, he adds: "We have forgotten your father. He must be rescued while the bandits are away from the cave; or else they must be captured. We must rouse the mining camp, and start the vigilantes. You ride there with the news, while I hold the fort until help comes."

But this plan is frustrated by the arrival of the bandits. There is a clatter of horses' hoofs down the gravelly ascent, and Brannard, placing himself impulsively in front of Eleanor, stands with his pistol raised to defend her. The futility of a single-handed fight in the open air with a party of bravadoes is so clear, however, that he at once retreats with the girl into the barracks. He has barely time to bar the doors before they are in the yard. Having armed Eleanor, at her own request, with a revolver, he leads the way to an upper room. The clouds, that in the earlier part of the night were dull and leaden, have all cleared away, and now one sees a most heavenly night. Every tree and shrub and leaf is a-glitter and moonlight, lying over all, softens and deepens into tenderest beauty each thing it touches.

"There, look!" whispers Eleanor, hurriedly, tightening her fingers on Brannard's.

Slowly, as they watch, a party of robbers move toward the principal entrance. One of these, striking a match, sets fire to a pine stick and then moves rapidly toward the door.

The officer at this, placing the girl in an angle where she is for the present safe, flings wide the window, and calls aloud to the men down below.

"What do you want here, you fellows?" he says, in a clear and by no means conciliatory tone.

His sudden presence causes them to come to a standstill. Parley among themselves then ensues, of a very animated order, until broken by Jim, who, separating himself a little from the others, glances defiantly up at the window. He carries in his right hand a revolver.

"You!" he says, insolently, in answer to the question.

"Well, you see me," says Brannard, calmly. "What can I do for you?"

"Nothing. We're going to do for you to-night!"

"As for that, we shall see. The first man who lays that lighted torch to the door will get a bullet through his brain."

"There are more bullets than yours," shouts another voice, derisively, and almost with the words something whistles past the officer's head and lodges itself in the wall behind him.

"A near shave," says the young man, with a low laugh. It is a dangerous laugh, however, full of revengeful possibilities, but without a suspicion of fear. Eleanor comes quickly to his side. Her soul is filled with pride for him. She is as pale as she might be lying in her shroud, but there is no sign of faintness about her now. She does not even ask him to make terms with the miserable miscreants beneath.

"Stand a little to this side; you will be more out of their range," is all she says, drawing him, as she speaks, into the desired position.

"Keep well behind me," he says, anxiously; "but if you can with safety, point out to me the man who fired that shot. My own wreched eyes are of small use to me in this uncertain light."

"It was the tall one by the post. There, be on your guard."

As she says this, another bullet flies past him, tearing a small bit of cloth from the shoulder of his coat.

"Why will you expose yourself?" cries Eleanor, vehemently. "Stand back."

He fires, and one of the men staggers and falls. A thin, dark stream of blood is creeping along the ground.

"It is horrible," says Eleanor. She staggers a little, and lays her hand upon Brannard's arm. It is but for a moment. Then she recovers herself, and, standing upright, stares with determination upon the group beneath—she has even moved a little forward. Her light gown coming thus prominently into notice, lit by the rays of the glorious moon, is distinctly visible, and brings into bold relief the dark form of Brannard standing a step or so in front of her.

Two or three of the men are stooping over the prostrate body and are drawing it to the rear. The surgeon is so intent upon the wounded man, and finds such a difficulty in bringing his deficient sight to bear upon him that he grows forgetful of consequences and steps into the full glare of the moonlight. Eleanor, who is awe-struck by the presence of death, stands by his side, smitten by the solemnity of the moment into incautiousness. A spark of light, however, catching her side view, she involuntarily turns her head in its direction. A little riotous moonbeam glinting off the steel barrel of a pistol has caused this spark. The weapon itself is raised, and the muzzle is pointed at the very heart of the young man. The ruffian is pausing, as though to make sure of his mark. There is no time for warning of any sort. In a second she has raised the revolver in her own hand and fired. A second explosion follows hard on hers, and then a cry of agony. The bandit, throwing one arm upward (the other is hanging broken by his side), staggers backward and sinks into the embrace of a man who hurries toward him. Presently there is a movement among them, and then, almost before one can grasp the fact, they have all gone from the gravel sweep, have melted away once more into the shadows of the trees.

"You saved my life then!" cried Brannard, turning to her excitedly. "Just as he fired I saw my danger, not before. It was too late then to move. But your bullet saved me. I owe my very existence to you, my brave darling. See! His bullet must have passed right between us, under your arm."

"But where have they gone?" exclaimed she, anxiously. "Have they abandoned their evil work? Have we proved ourselves too strong for them?"

She has stooped forward. Her face, as the moonlight falls upon it, looks ghastly. He gazes at her keenly. Then something that soils her gown attracts his attention. The sleeve has been rudely torn away from her white arm, and on the hanging fragments of cashmere and trickling down the fair, soft flesh is blood.

"You are wounded," he cries in a dreadful voice. "And for me; to save me! Have they killed you? Speak to me!"

"Wounded," repeats the girl, vaguely. Then she sways a little, and with a little confiding gesture toward him, full of pathos, falls unconscious upon his breast. He lays her gently on a bed and tenderly dresses the wound, which is a severe one only in his loving eyes. She recovers her courage speedily. Daylight comes in the hour spent in bringing the girl quite back to herself. Then they walk down to the mining camp to give an alarm. It is almost deserted.

"The boys have gone to lynch some thieves," says an old man.

Brannard and Eleanor procure a second horse, and together ride to Black Sam's cave. There they find a horrible sight. The seven bandits who returned from the assault on Camp Tampa are hanged to the trees. The miners, having learned their character, have executed lynch law upon them. Col. Lorley, after a momentary difficulty in overcoming the prejudices of the miners against himself, has conducted them into the cave. Black Sam was awake. As they entered the rocky chamber, the robber drew a revolver and fired a shot at the Colonel. Luckily, his recumbent position made his aim uncertain. The invaders sprang upon him, but before they could prevent it he turned his revolver against his own breast, shooting himself through the heart.

This has barely been done when Brannard and Eleanor arrive. The boxes and sacks of treasure are loaded on horses and transported to Camp Tampa, where a peace is that day made between the miners, the deserting soldiers and the commandant. The reward offered for Black Sam and the stolen treasure is apportioned satisfactorily.

As for Brannard and Eleanor, they hold a private interview.

"Eleanor!" He makes a step forward and then stops, as though determined to kill the rising hope within him. "If I thought there was a chance"— he begins, his voice somewhat unsteadily.

"There isn't," she says, plucking at a fold in her gown and with averted eyes; "it's a certainty." Here she makes another brave effort to smile, but breaks down. "I—I love you," she says, and bursts into tears.

"O love! O darling!" says the young man, and then involuntarily they move toward each other. There is a tremulous pause, a faltering glance, and then the veil is torn down, and they find happiness imparadised in one another's arms.

[THE END.]

Taught Him a Lesson.

It was just a little lesson, that was all, but it went right to the spot, says the Detroit Free Press. He stopped a moment on his way home to look at a florist's window, and the florist, who saw him, asked him inside to see something extra fine.

"You don't buy any more flowers now?" said the florist.

"No," was the response, given good-naturedly, though it was brief.

"And it used to be, a year ago or more, that roses and violets and carnations and all sorts were a great attraction to you?"

"Yes: I had a sweetheart then," and the man blushed and laughed.

"You used to take her a flower every time you went to see her, didn't you?" pursued the inquisitive, kindly old florist.

"Yes."

"And they didn't cost very much, as a rule, did they?"

"Oh, no; but that didn't make any difference to her. If I brought them fresh and fragrant that was enough."

"Why don't you take them to her now? Did she choose another in your stead?" and the florist's voice was sympathetic."

"Oh, no; I married her a year ago."

The florist waited a moment as if thinking.

"And you don't love her now?" he asked cautiously, as if treading on thin ice.

"Of course. We are very happy. But you know the flower business doesn't go any more."

"Did she ever say so?" asked the florist.

"Well—um—er—no, I can't say that she ever did."

"Have you ever asked her about it?"

"No, I never happened to think of it. Busy, you know, with all sorts of things, so much more practical."

The florist didn't answer. He went to a pot of roses and violets, and, taking a handful, he handed them over to his late customer.

"There," he said. "I give them to you in remembrance of old times. You might take them to your wife, and if she doesn't like them you can bring them back to me."

But they never came back.

PIGEONS ON BOARD SHIP.

Carried Out of Sight of Land, They Soon Become Tame Pets.

On the return of the training ship Portsmouth to the Brooklyn navy-yard from a voyage to the Mediterranean she had a large number of pigeons aboard. The birds were of the common variety and lived in a coop on the hurricane deck near the forecastle. The boys had procured them at some port while the vessel was still cruising about. One day at sea, when all traces of land were lost, the birds were released from their prison. The crew gathered on deck to see what they would do. Some thought they would not leave the ship; others expected to see them take their bearings and then, like carrier pigeons, fly landward. All were mistaken, says the Youth's Companion, for after a joyous sail over the blue ocean they returned to their cage and settled down to everyday life. They became tame at once and fond of the seamen and boys, who fed them from their hands. They constantly flitted about the decks, at times even causing annoyance by walking about the gangway under the busy sailors' feet. At other times they would perch in the rigging seemingly content with their nautical lives. In port they would fly ashore, but always returned at night to roost in their coop. When at last the orders were given to hoist anchors for home many of the pigeons were out on their daily fly. The sails were spread and the big ship was wafted away. The boys and sailors all felt very sorry for the disappointment the birds would meet that evening when they returned and found the ship had sailed. But before night, when the land, like a tiny green speck, faded from sight in the twilight, there was suddenly a flutter in the rigging and the missing birds dropped down and entered their cage. The hearts of all the homeward bound ship's company rejoiced. Upon their arrival in Brooklyn the pigeons showed themselves as much at home in the air around the great bridge and over New York City as in any foreign port.

FIRST TO SAIL TO CHICAGO.

It Was the Schooner Tracy, Which Arrived There Ninety Years Ago.

The first vessel that arrived in this port was the schooner Tracy, in the year 1803, with a man named Dorr as master, says a writer in the Detroit News. This vessel was either owned or chartered by the government, and conveyed Captain John Whistler, U. S. A., and his command, together with supplies and material for the construction of a fort at the mouth of the Chicago River. He built Fort Dearborn, which was located at the point which is now the corner of Michigan avenue and River street. Captain Whistler remained at this post, I think, until 1809 or 1810, when he was relieved by Captain Heald and ordered to report at Detroit, and was with General Hull at the time of the surrender in 1812. Captain Whistler was the father of the late Mrs. Judge James Abbott, Mrs. Major Hamilton, and Mrs. Captain Phelan, all old residents of Detroit. Mrs. William R. Wood, another daughter, was well known in the early society of Detroit as a young lady. She was born in Fort Dearborn about the year 1805. Colonel William Whistler, son of the Captain, will also be remembered by many old Detroiters, having been stationed there with his regiment for several years. General U. S. Grant was a lieutenant in his regiment at the time. The judge and Mrs. Abbott were married at Fort Dearborn, and their bridal trip was made from Chicago to Detroit on horseback. They camped out at night and followed the Indian trail, which was afterward known as the Territorial road, through Michigan. The steamers Sheldon Thompson and William Penn were the first steamers that stirred the waters of Chicago harbor. They arrived here together on July 8, 1831, having on board General Winfield Scott and soldiers for the Black Hawk war. At this time (eighteen years after Captain Whistler and his troops first set foot upon Chicago soil) the city of Chicago could boast of only five houses, and three of these were built of logs.—Chicago Herald.

Well Earned.

"Though not a beauty, I have the reputation of being a popular woman," said Minerva, "but no one knows how hard I worked to gain my success. I have studied the art of conversation in all its phases, and know when to talk and when to be silent. I keep a notebook at hand, and every quaint expression, every good story, every amusing thing I see or read or hear, which I think will work up into a telling sentence, down it goes in classified order. Then I just sit down and cram for a dinner as a schoolgirl does for examination. My mind is like my gown; after it is once ready I think no more about it. I try to find out the people I am to meet, what they are interested in, and then I lead up to appropriate topics, introducing them as adroitly as possible, fill in the gaps with my nonsense, and get people to talking. That is the way to entertain them. Every human being is happier in telling a good story than hearing one. I once went down to dinner with a famous man talker, and not feeling as well as usual, contrived to keep him talking in order to prevent the people from noticing my silence. The next day he told everybody I was the brightest woman he ever saw. That was my cue, and I have never forgotten it. The machinery does not show; but I usually go home from a dinner as weary as a ballet-girl after the performance. It is much easier to say the bright thing than to make some one else say it, but an avowedly smart woman is a mistake. Men are afraid of her, and even women are not at ease in her vicinity."

Camphor Poisoning.

Camphor is a household remedy put to many purposes. The medicinal uses are principally in headache, cold in the head, and in nausea and fainting. In such cases camphor in solution is held to the nose, and the vapor inhaled. As long as it is used in this way it can do no harm; but, unfortunately, many people take it internally in some form or other, and often run some risk in doing so.

Camphor as a medicine is generally used by laymen either in the form of the spirit of camphor or as camphor water. But few know wherein these differ; hence, one of the greatest dangers attending the drug. Spirits of camphor is made of camphor ten parts, alcohol seventy parts, and water twenty parts; the dose of this is from five to ten drops; whereas camphor water as now usually made, is water filtered through cotton moistened with a strong tincture of camphor; the dose of this is from a teaspoonful to a tablespoonful. It is easy to see how unfortunate it would be were one to mistake the spirit for the water of camphor, and take it in the usual dose of the latter.

In overdoses, camphor excites symptoms referable to the brain. There is giddiness and sleepiness, and, in extreme cases, fainting, delirium, convulsions and profound stupor occurs. Considering how wide its use, it is reasonable to suppose that deaths sometimes occur in consequence of poisonous doses of camphor, which are attributed to other causes. Just how much is required to kill is not known; but one author states that 30 grains have caused death in an infant, and 164 grains in a woman. Of course, the greatest danger attends its use in children.

All things considered, camphor is an agent which should be limited to external use and to inhalations, unless ordered by physicians.

Changes in Words.

Less than a century ago, the aristocratic pronunciation of "James," "Rome" and "gold," was "Jeames," "Room" and "goold." A "chariot" was a "charret," the trisyllable being deemed vulgar. "Obleege" was very common, fifty years since, with other pronunciations now quite gone out of use. "Picter" for "picture" was not a mark of want of education, as it would be now, while the old pronunciation "shore" for "sewer" was quite common. There was no rule for the quantity of the penult in "balcony." We all remember how, in Cowper's "diverting history," at Edmonton Mrs. Gilpin

> From the balcony spied
> Her tender husband, wondering much
> To see how he did ride;

while Swift, when describing "clever Tom Clinch's triumphal procession to Tyburn," writes:

> The maids to the doors of the balconies ran,
> And cried, "Lackaday, he's a proper young man!"

There never has been any general rule as to nouns ending in "ator." In Scotland the mode differed from the English in more usually throwing the accent back. Was it not Erskine who in his earlier days, having spoken of a "cur-ator," making the word a dactyl, was interrupted by the judge before whom he was pleading with "'Cur-ator,' if you please, Mr. Erskine; a Latin word with a long penult!" "Thank you, my lord," was the ready retort, "for your correction. I bow to the authority of so distinguished a 'sen-ator' and 'or-ator' as your lordship."

Utilization of Coal Dust.

The London Times gives an account of a process by which anthracite coal bricks are now being manufactured by the London Coal Brick Syndicate. The bricks are made of grains of anthracite dust, which are forced to cohere by means of a special cementing compound and by great pressure. The coal dust is mixed with the binding material in the proportion of 95 per cent. of the former to 4 per cent. of the latter. The compound is fed into a mixer, where it meets a jet of steam, a stiff paste being formed, which is delivered successively into a series of molds under a pressure of 2,500 weight. As the mold plate revolves the charge in each mold is brought between two rams, which exert a pressure of two tons per square inch on each side of the charge, forming a very dense and homogeneous coal brick. The brick, still in the mold, passes on to the delivery ram, by which it is pushed out on to a table, and is removed for the market. These coal bricks are said to make an excellent fuel, and to possess a very high efficiency for steam-raising purposes. The Times thinks that with such a fuel at the disposal of the public there is room to hope for a reduction in the pollution of the atmosphere of towns.

Worthy of Admiration.

In a hundred instances the French have turned the lesser things of this earth to good account. The thrift of a nation which can convert the vermin of its cities into objects of produce is worthy of our admiration, if not of our imitation. The town rat, which of all animals is generally considered the one most outside of our affections, is converted into a useful member of society in the Parisian capital. The rodents are collected and placed in the great pound where the carcass refuse of the city is thrown. These remains are quickly demolished by the rats who leave only untainted skeletons or bones behind them. The demolishers are in turn destroyed themselves. Four times a year a great battue is effected, and when next the little creatures appear it is in the form of that article of world-wide admiration—the Gant de Paris; indeed, no skin is superior to theirs, the pliability and strength of it rendering it the most suitable for the glove market.

A New Locomotive.

The Raub locomotive is attracting attention in the railroad world. The distinguishing feature is that the pistons are placed vertically instead of horizontally. They are three in number, instead of two, and are located between two boilers which are wholly independent of each other. The piston rods are attached to a crank shaft, each attachment making an angle of sixty degrees with the other two, so as to avoid the dead center. The driving rods are attached to the crank shaft and are lifted up and pushed down instead of being driven by force exerted horizontally, as in ordinary locomotives. The inventor claims extraordinary power, and the two boilers give him steam capacity to reach 100 miles an hour with a good-sized train without any trouble. The cab is between the two boilers and the ends of the locomotive are right and left duplicates of each other, so the locomotive looks equally well and works equally well running in either direction. The preliminary tests are said to have resulted very satisfactorily.

His success in the treatment of piles can be amply attested by hundreds whom he cured during his former visits. I can cure any case of piles, no matter of how long standing, or how hopeless the case may be. The patient suffers no pain or inconvenience. In most cases one treatment is sufficient, which takes only a few minutes, and the time required for a cure is about two weeks, during which time the patient is not inconvenienced from business. 20tf

MAN in Connecticut, a farmer, found in an old tree last week, a bottle of whiskey his hired man put there thirty-six years ago.

EX-PRESIDENT HARRISON is talked of for the next republican candidate for president. Stranger things than that have happened.

SOUTH CAROLINA liquor law went into effect Saturday. The state takes charge of the business and runs all the saloons. It is a queer idea, but may work.

GOV. ALTGELD of Illinois is being savagely criticized for pardoning the anarchists. But he says he thinks he did what was his duty and does not regret it.

INDIANA gas belt is still striking monster gas wells. It would appear that as fast as the old wells get weak, new gushers are struck. So the gas belt will go right on in its prosperity.

ANOTHER train robbery attempted last week on a Texas railroad. Plucky employes made a fight, and drove them off, capturing their leader. The fireman of the train was killed while resisting the robbers.

IT is now alleged that Schnaubelt, the man who is believed to have been the real one to throw the bomb at the Haymarket riots, is now living in San Francisco. Possibly the right man may be found yet.

GOSHEN has a foot race July 15, under the auspices of Hose Co. No. 4. It is the "All America Professional Sweepstakes," Purse $2,200 and $350 guaranteed gate money. The winner gets the whole stake and world's championship, diamond and gold medal. The gate money goes to the men who stand first, second and third. The entries of eleven professional men are already recorded, famous runners from all parts of the union and from Canada.

CONGRESS has been called to meet in special session the 7th of August, a month earlier than had been intended. It has been several years since we have had an extra session. They generally wait till the regular time, the first Monday in December. But at present the countyr's financial matters are in such a bad condition, owing to the mistakes in republican legislation and management that something must be done soon. But as it has taken many years to get things in this bad shape, it may take some time to make it right again.

TRUSTEES of the State Normal at Terre Haute have refused to have any commencement exercises or permit any students to graduate. This year's class numbered sixty-nine, but there had been much trouble and insubordination caused by the board's action in dropping from the list of teachers, Prof. Arnold Tompkins. Whatever may be said of the board's action in regard to Tompkins it is still plain that the students cannot be be permitted to fail in their obedience to the rules of the school. The state supports the school in order that education may be advanced, but cannot afford to have the rules of its board of trustees broken.

Notice to Non-Residents.

STATE OF INDIANA, DEKALB COUNTY, ss:

In the DeKalb Circuit Court, May term 1893, Frank M. Stiles is hereby notified that an action has been commenced against him in said court, for divorce and custody of child by Blanche Stiles and that the same will be heard and determined on August 8th, the same being the 21st juridical day of the May term of said court, which commenced May 15th, 1893.

Witness, the Clerk of said court, this 5th day of July, 1893.

DANIEL D. MOODY, Clerk.

F. L. Welsheimer, Plaintiff's Attorney.

How We Celebrated.

It was a regular old-time celebration that Auburn had. The morning was pleasant, and even before the sun appeared to those on the ground a squad of our military standing atop of the three story block north of the public square, caught sight of the sun's jolly face and greeted him with repeated volleys of musketry. This was responded to by Rus Guilford's cannon on the public square, the discharges from both being regular and rapid. The town was awakened by this time and bells all over began a merry ringing, while the small boys hastily jerked on a few garments, grabbed their trusty fire crackers and started out. The racket began. Perhaps this last assertion was needless. But from this on it was bang and smell, and which was loudest it was hard to determine. The Angola Band came in on the south-bound train and were received at the station by the Auburn bicyclers, who also escorted them up the street to the public square. When the meeting in the grove was organized, Mabel Hartman read the grand old declaration of independence in a very impressive manner, though part of it could not be heard on account of the loud reports of hundreds of fire crackers. This went on unchecked till she was done and also all through Mr. Moody's speech which followed. His speech was a splendid effort and delivered with so much energy and earnestness that he even succeeded at times in overshadowing the volleys of fire crackers. He was liberally complimented on all hands for his fine address under such disadvantages. It must have been very annoying to both him and Miss Hartman, but they fought down the difficulty most admirably. Afternoon came the address of Col. Luther Benson, one of the best known champions of prohibition. It was able and eloquent, but he too had difficulty at first to be heard in the hilarious racket of Freedom's great birthday. Finally, Mr. Moody arose, and on behalf of the committee, announced a number of citizens who should go out and try to control the crowd. This had some effect, and from that on it was better, though never still. Those near by listened well. The fire company then gave their exhibition, the big teams making a grand show and water was thrown inside of four minutes. A fine parade and drill was given by the Auburn Rifles, ending with a lively sham battle. The boys covered themselves with glory. The funniest thing we had was the trotting race between Knoder's pacing dog and L. J. Miller's pony, for as they came across Seventh street, the dog made a break for home at a wild dash, while the pony was still speeding up north. The bicycle parade was fine, 86 wheels being in line, many of them gaily decorated. Nearly half of those taking part were ladies. Dr. Hines, with his little child in front, made a nice figure. Mr. Cobb, the life and head of this splendid show, was ably seconded by Mr. Du Wan, the captain of the club. The relay race followed. The riders were stationed out on the Waterloo road and listened for the cannon, two shots being the signal. Then the audience waited a few minutes and they appeared, coming down at a furious rate. At the public square, the man with the packet handed it to the next as he rapidly passed, and the new man sprang forward like a rocket. At the return south of town, one man carried it without stopping, back to the north, the crowd being greatly excited to see him carrying it in his teeth. On the final return, it was delivered to Mr. Moody, who read it to the crowd.

The first message was as follows:

AUBURN, IND., July 4, 1893.

ARTHUR B. STEELE AND RELAY RIDERS.

Good boys. Good time. Adjourn to Salyer's restaurant and have a jumbo lemonade on me.

BOB MCDOUGALL.

The second was to the point and read:

TO THE TOWN COUNCIL OF AUBURN:

We would respectfully call your attention to the unnecessary heights of the crossings on North Main Street. The bumps from which we now suffer appeal to you for sympathy and aid; and for heaven's sake, don't let another season go by without making decided improvements on West Seventh street, and we Wheelmen and all who appreciate good roads will be duly grateful.

THE WHEELMEN OF RELAY RACE.

When the cheering subsided, Mr. Rakestraw, who was the only member of the board present, answered that the board was willing, if they knew they had the power.

Then followed the fireworks under the immediate charge of Mr. Aber and Mr. Freygang, assisted later by Sheriff Ralston. It was the best of the many fine displays we have had. Much of the crowd had remained all day. And it was about the largest crowd we have had, and except the small boys' noise, was one of the most orderly.

The Dispatch's Poor Memory.

The Dispatch has a bad, bad memory. It can't remember this year what it advocated last year. It said last week, that it had always advocated a saving in bridges. But its own files which we have in our office will show that for several years, it has been urging the commissioners to increase this very expense of bridges. It continually asked that all bridges be made of iron, with stone abutments. This would make each bridge cost three or four times as much as if built of wood with pile abutments, as the COURIER repeatedly showed. We gave the figures for this several times. We showed that a wooden bridge would ordinarily last about fifteen years, a fact that the commissioners furnished to us. And we further showed, that the difference in cost between a wooden bridge and a stone and iron one, would if put at interest build a new bridge before the life of the wooden one was half gone. But still the Dispatch wanted iron bridges with stone abutments. Unfortunately the commissioners partly yielded to the demand of the Dispatch and of Commissioner Lockwood and of the men he had written letters to asking their opinion, for they built a number of of these expensive bridges. This is where a large part of our $18,000 for bridges went. If the Dispatch's plan had prevailed fully the expense would have been over $22,000.

Again the Dispatch, in speaking of our great expenses for the past year, says "there is no great public improvement to show for it." Here is a mistake. We have several of the very improvements the Dispatch has been asking for including the bridges, besides, many it did not ask for such as the sidewalk and with its gutters and iron hitching posts around the public square; new public closets, new boilers and heaters for the jail and court house, some needed improvements at the poor farm, etc. As for the ditches, why blame the commissioners for this expense? The people insist on having ditches but the board does not petition for them. Ditches are a good thing, but they cost too much. And we might make this last remark about many other things over which the commissioners have no control. They are often over-reached in the business they are obliged to handle, but we should not blame them for such as they cannot control. For our own part, there is much that we think the board understands better than we do. And we presume the same is true, as to the Dispatch only it is so egotistical that it believes itself capable of giving advice on all subjects under the heavens or in the earth beneath. But while giving advice in '93 it should not forget the sort of advice it gave in '92. There are, however, some things the Dispatch has very good ideas about, but it is surprising to find that it thinks no one else in the county has any good ideas but itself. It is especially narrow minded as to the commissioners.

The Columbia City Post wants the COURIER to say whether DeKalb county, is as well managed financially as Whitley. Our answer is, that we don't know. We are not interfering with Whitley county. We presume Whitley can attend to her own business. DeKalb county's annual expense is much greater than Whitley's. But DeKalb is making many valuable improvements that Whitley is not looking after. This may or may not account for the difference. But as our people insist on these improvements, knowing they will have to pay for them the presumption would naturally be that they alone are the parties most deeply interested. That is our view of it, and as we know very little and care very little about what other counties are doing, we are not sufficiently interested to make any valuable comparisons. DeKalb county is good enough for us.

My little boy was very bad off for two months with diarrhea. We used various medicines, also called in two doctors, but nothing did him any good until we used Chamberlain's colic, cholera and diarrhea remedy, which gave immediate relief and soon cured him. We used almost everything without benefit. Then I said, let us try Chamberlain's colic, cholera and diarrhea remedy, which we did, and that cured us right away. Mrs. William Sprankle.

It was a sad death, that of Mrs. Wm. Sprankle last Friday—a young woman suddenly called away in the prime of life and under the saddest of circumstances, for she died in childbirth. She leaves one child and a husband to mourn her early death. There was a brief service by Mr. Brosy at the residence on north VanBuren street Sunday forenoon, but the funeral proper was at Waterloo in the Evangelical church and the interment was in the lovely cemetery there. She was a sister of Willard and Warren Fee and a most estimable lady. The bereaved husband has the sympathy of all who know of the sad circumstances.

Traveled in Ballet Costume.

Monday the marshal of Kendallville was over here on the hunt of two fellows who had stolen bicycles up there. He had captured them the evening before, and as Kendallville has no lockup since the old one burned, he took them to his own residence to hold them over night. In order to make sure they would not escape he put them in the second story, took all their clothes away, tied them fast as he supposed, and locked them in. But next morning they were missing. But as he still had their clothes he thinks they must have looked and felt like ballet dancers, as they skipped across the country on that chilly night, clad only in a thin shirt and an equally limited amount of modesty. He started out early to get them if he could and had made quite a circle over the country taking in Avilla and Garrett, and from Auburn he went up to Waterloo and Ashley. We have not heard the result.

Bicycle Stealing.

Stealing bicycles bids fair to become as popular or unpopular as horse stealing used to be. We have in another column an account of two men who stole bicycles at Kendallville and were arrested. It will also be remembered that Walter Hartman had a fine wheel stolen from him a few days before he left the University at Ann Arbor to come home for his summer vacation. About a dozen other wheels were stolen and he and the other unfortunates made a strong effort to secure the discovery and arrest of the thieves, though without success. He left the matter with the officers there when he started home, and on Saturday he got a letter from the sheriff that the wheel had been found. A copy of the Ann Arbor Argus of June 30 gives the following additional account:

Deputy Sheriff Peterson has done a good piece of detective work in ferreting out the bicycle thieves and putting a stop to that kind of thieving in this section. His work resulted in the arrest of Miles Linklater, who has been a law student and was employed at the Psi U. house as a waiter at the time of his arrest, and of Charles Davis, who lives in the first ward and was brought up at Mooreville, for stealing bicycles. Two of the bicycles were recovered. Two complaints were made against each man. Linklater waived examination and was bound over to the circuit court with $500 bail in each case. Davis had his examination Wednesday and was bound over, with the same bail. Neither has yet furnished the bail. The bicycles were recovered at Mooreville, and were found in a swamp on the farm of William Bush, the grandfather of Davis. They had been taken apart and carefully secreted, Bush denying that the two arrested men had been there. He was arrested for receiving stolen property. One of the wheels recovered was a St. James, an imported wheel stolen from Robert Dunn; the other was a Victor, stolen from W. C. Hartman. The wheels were stolen on the night of June 5. They were put in a vacant shed on Madison street, moved to a barn, moved again, and finally, last week, were taken to Mooreville. Neither Davis nor Linklater could ride them. They started for Mooreville at 10 o'clock at night, pushing the wheels all the way, and reaching there at three o'clock in the morning. The distance is fourteen miles. Hiding the wheels in Bush's barn and getting a lunch, they walked back, reaching Ann Arbor at eight o'clock. The officers believe that Bush secreted the wheels in the swamp after they had made the first search for them. At the examination, a young man named McFadden testified that Davis told him about the stealing of the wheels and wanted him to sell them. He did speak to a couple of young Dexter men about them. Deputy Sheriff Peterson worked very hard on the case, making a number of trips to Mooreville, and his good work is worthy of much praise.

A. H. Gillis & Co.

This is the firm in the new Floral Meat Market, in the Tarney building. They may now be considered as fully established in business and in popular favor. Mr. Gillis began here, taking charge in person, when they first opened out, and last week the other partner, Charles D. Knisely moved here from his former home in Edgerton, Ohio. Both partners being here, they take entire charge of the business, both indoors and out, and will be found accommodating and pleasant gentlemen to deal with. Goods and room will always be found neat and tidy. Their fresh meats are all home raised. They will also keep a choice line of canned goods for family supply which all heads of families should try. Remember the place and give the new firm a trial.

Prompt Payment.

The general agent of the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company was in town last Friday and paid to Mrs. Harter, the $3,000 policy held by Mr. Harter, only nineteen days after his death. It is because of such promptness in adjusting all claims against it, and its business-like and conservative methods, that the Northwestern has become one of the most popular of the good insurance companies of the country.

Don't Know What They are Saying.

There is an alleged newspaper at Garrett that claims "for five years we have been urging the commissioners to publish an itemized statement." Yet this same alleged paper has not published the statement once, though the commissioners have twice paid for a full copy and sent it to them postage paid. The question is, Do they lie knowingly? Don't they know enough to know what they have published? Or, do they know what a report of allowances is, anyway? This reminds us of the way they took to prove the COURIER had lied. We said Hank had been arrested and fined in Auburn for being drunk. The next week they said the COURIER lied and in proof of this said: "We (Clipper editor) have been taken three or four times before a justice of the peace for intoxication. The first time was before Judge Powers." Then he goes on to explain the three or four arrests, etc., fully—all to prove that we lied when we said he had been arrested. "Three times before a justice, one of which was Judge Powers" takes the cake. Perhaps if he could remember better what happened, then one of these justices would turn out to be Judge McBride. At all events he admits a more disreputable record than we charged him with.

Given, then, that you want to do business, the only remaining question is how to do it best. There can be but one general answer to that, and that is the use of the advertising columns of the newspapers.

When a man discovers himself to be the father of triplets he can hardly believe his own census.

The Rev. M. L. Gates, a Jersey City minister, has started a crusade against candy, which he regards as the greatest enemy of young people. With few exceptions, the latter will enthusiastically fall in and destroy all the candy that comes within their reach.

The late Marquis of Exeter discovered that swans will keep water perfectly free from weeds. At Burghley, a piece of water which used to employ three men for six months in the year to keep it tolerably clean is now kept completely clean by two pair of swans.

The holding up of trains is getting uncomfortably frequent. Soon a traveler will have to carry a gun in each boot-leg, a Winchester instead of a sachel. Bank robberies are becoming more common, and the ease with which their perpetrators escape with the plunder has ceased to create comment. Are we going to drift back into the middle ages and barbarism?

It is proposed to redeem the pine barrens of Michigan, from which the timber has been removed, by sowing two plants, spurry and flat pea. The first makes good feed for cattle and sheep and its roots bind the earth and help to form a firm soil. It is thought that millions of acres in the Peninsular State, now utterly worthless, may thus be made to serve the uses of man.

Bees and birds court the society of man—that is, they seek the localities where fields and gardens abound, for they fare better when human industry extorts from the soil the products upon which they subsist. A Maine bee culturist says it is the rarest thing in the world to find bees away from the settlements or from openings where flowers grow. It is in the small patches of forests they are oftenest found and generally not far from the edge of the woods. It is the same with birds. There are no song birds in the Northern Maine wilderness and scarcely any bird life.

It may not be generally known that Paris is the great postage-stamp market of the world, and that there are more men there who gloat over a black Bermuda, or go into ecstasies over a yellow something else, than in any other capital. There is a regular Bourse held every Thursday and Sunday in a corner of the Champs Elysees, where hundreds of men, women and boys congregate with their postage-stamp albums and packages of stamps for sale and exchange. There is almost as big a gabble of tongues going on there as at the regular Bourse, and so great has the throng become that the authorities contemplate roofing in that particular part. It is said that thousands of francs change hands there every market day.

An extremely cruel "joke" was recently played upon a young lady of good family and spotless character, writes the Paris correspondent of the Sketch. An advertisement appeared in the columns of a popular advertising paper, the Petites Affiches, and ran as follows: "Damoiselle, 30 ans, jolie, distinguee, ayant fortune, legere tache, desire se marier avec monsieur ayant petite position," and ended with the full name and address of the young lady. Within two days she had over fifty answers. She was most indignant and furious at having her reputation attacked in this manner and the representation that she was publicly seeking a husband, and so she very properly brought an action against the paper. It was defended, and apologies were offered and great regrets expressed. The magistrates said that the newspaper had not made proper inquiries as to the source of such an advertisement, and, therefore, the proprietors were fined five francs and one franc damages.

Millionaires have no business fooling around with steamboats, because when they do they always get into trouble. Capt. James Davidson, of Bay City, is the latest illustration of the truth of this statement. Capt. Davidson was a hardy and fearless mariner in his youth, but the acquisition of wealth blunted his nautical perceptions, and when he undertook to steer one of his own tugboats out of Racine harbor he landed her high and dry on a reef, to his great vexation and discomfiture. The result is invariable. Some years ago James Gordon Bennett, of the New York Herald, was fired with a like ambition in the harbor of Cherbourg, where a naval review was going on. He took the wheel of his yacht Namouna, and in fifteen minutes the navies of all nations were pulling up anchors, shivering their timbers and resorting to all known maritime expedients to get out of the way of an unarmed American journalist. It was a pleasing sight to a patriotic citizen of the United States, but it demonstrated the fact pointed out in the beginning that the possession of wealth does not necessarily constitute a good steersman.

It appears from private accounts from Australia that the chief losses in the recent failures will fall upon the English stockholders and depositors. Most of the Australians had warning in time, and withdrew their money. But the failure of financial institutions which, with their branches, must have numbered not less than a thousand, must place the merchants who did business with them in such a position of peril that they cannot tell whether they are solvent or bankrupt. When a merchant has to take care of both sides of the ledger, he cannot know where he stands. It seems, therefore, that we must wait a while before we can see where the colonies are going to fetch up. From a revulsion of this character there is but one way out—that is, by the road of liquidation. And in the present state of business in Australia six-thousand-dollars-a-front-foot lots and shares in mining companies are not likely to find eager buyers. In the panics we have seen in this country there have been times when no kind of property seemed to possess value. Yet the Australian banks must realize on their assets, for it is only by so doing that they can hope to pay their debts.

When la grippe became epidemic in this country three years ago there were many medical men and others who wrote learnedly about the disease as one that had never before been known in this country. They traced it to Russia, and went to Russian and French authorities for remedies, where they did not make entirely new discoveries for themselves. But here again was illustrated the force of Napoleon's observation that "nothing is new but what has been forgotten." In an old copy of the Salem (Mass.) Observer, printed June 24, 1843, or just fifty years ago, is to be found this paragraph: "The influenza or la grippe is getting to be very prevalent in Philadelphia. A correspondent of the Spirit of the Times, writing from New York and speaking of the influenza, says: 'We are laboring under its infliction in capital style. New York is now a city of sneezers, and coughers and nose-blowers cry aloud in the streets, and no one heedeth them. Upward of considerable, if not more, of the actors in every theater are down with the epidemic, and a change of performances, from sudden indisposition, is of nightly and looked-for occurrence. Several of our clergy on Sunday 'giv' in' from inability to conquer the givings of their congregated coughs.'" The same paper records that the United States Court had to adjourn because of the disease, that the sailors were unable to man the ships in the harbor, and that the newspaper offices were almost depopulated.

America's First Bell.

The convent of La Rabida in Chicago, modeled upon the famous Spanish convent which afforded an asylum to Columbus and his son during the darkest days of the great navigator's life, is perhaps at the present time one of the most attractive shrines in the world. It is full of Columbian relics. The descendants of Columbus, the monarchs of Spain and the Pope have sent articles of priceless value to the Chicago convent. Among the collection of relics is the bell which Columbus had placed in the first church erected in the new world. This church was built in 1493 in Isabella, Columbus' first colony in San Domingo. Isabella is now but a ruin. The bell was found by a peasant and was taken possession of by the San Domingo government, which loaned it for exhibition at the World's Fair.

RECIPROCITY FRAUD.

LOSS TO COMMERCE UNDER REPUBLICAN RULE.

Our Protective Tariff Is a Proclamation to All Nations that the American Manufacturers Cannot Compete on Equal Terms with the Manufacturers of Europe.

Delusion and Snare.

In August, 1890, Mr. Blaine, recognizing that there was a growing demand for larger markets, suggested "reciprocity" as a palliative of the evils of protection. In a speech delivered at Waterville, Me., August 29, 1890, Mr. Blaine said: "I am here to speak of an expansion of our foreign trade." Comparing the returns for 1889, he declared that with the countries to the south of us we had by commerce "lost" $142,000,000 in one year. With Cuba we "lost," according to Mr. Blaine, $41,000,000, as we imported $52,000,000 and exported only $11,000,000. With Brazil we "lost" $51,000,000, importing $60,000,000 and exporting $9,000,000. With Mexico we "lost" $10,000,000, buying $21,000,000 and selling $11,000,000. That was Mr. Blaine's idea of commerce; that was his plea for "reciprocity."

Turning now to the record of 1892, under reciprocity we find an alarming condition infinitely worse, according to Mr. Blaine's philosophy, than in 1889. In 1892 we "lost" with Cuba $60,000,000, as against $40,000,000 in 1889, importing $78,000,000 and exporting only $18,000,000. With Brazil our "losses" in 1892 were $104,341,731, as against $51,052,723 in the "dark year" of 1890. In 1892 we imported $118,633,604 and exported only $41,240,009. With Mexico our "losses" in 1892 were $13,813,526, against $9,766,705 in 1889, our imports being $28,107,525, our exports only $13,696,531. Throughout the record is the same. The discrepancy between imports and exports is growing at an enormous rate, and if this discrepancy represents a "loss," as Mr. Blaine contends, then we are rushing headlong to ruin.

That there should be some increase in our exports was inevitable. Every obstruction, natural or artificial, lessens commerce; every removal of an obstruction increases the volume of commerce. The relaxing of the protective principle led to an increase in exchanges, but absolute free trade would have led to a fair exchange and to larger exports. Of course this discrepancy between imports and exports is in no sense a "loss," but it has its lesson. Brazil, Cuba and Mexico offer us their products at prices we are willing to pay, and so they sell to us in great quantities.

We offer to Mexico, Brazil and Cuba products of our mills at prices greater than those named by Germany, France and England, and so our neighbors send their orders across the water. Commerce will continue to run in these channels until we revise our tariff for our own benefit; until we relieve our own people, manufacturers and consumers of outrageous burdens and enter competitive markets on equal terms with other nations. What we need is not reciprocity, but free trade. We must be able to show all nations that our manufacturers do not need "protection;" that they are able to hold their home markets against all comers and are ready to undersell Europe in any American market.

Our protective tariff is a proclamation to all nations that the American manufacturers cannot compete on equal terms with the manufacturers of Europe. What would be thought of a city merchant who advertised that he could not sell goods at prices named by his competitors? That is what America does with its protective tariff and its alleged treaties of reciprocity. For these reasons we should abandon the hypocritical pretense of reciprocity and substitute for it the offer of Jefferson's "free commerce with all nations."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

Why We Need Protection.

According to the catalogue of the German Section of the Chicago Exhibition nine-tenths of all the articles of coloring matter of the world are now produced in Germany. In 1891 German exports of aniline colors amounted to nearly $15,000,000, a large proportion being sent to the East Indies to displace coloring matter of native origin. These facts indicate the close alliance between German manufacturers and men of science. A recent article in Nature gives an account of the research laboratory attached to a manufactory of dye-stuffs in Elberfeld. In it no less than twenty-six skilled chemists are constantly in the service of the company, while as many more are employed in other departments. An even larger number is employed at the works in Baden, seventy-eight chemists, of whom fifty-six have the Ph. D. degree, being there engaged in investigations in the services of a single firm. Here we get a glimpse of the real "pauper labor" of Europe against which our manufacturers cannot compete. Instead of encouraging the yoking of science and industry, the discovery of new methods and machinery, and perfection in technical education, the true American policy is to tax foreign products out of the country, and enable manufacturers who are behind the times to make a living.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Custom House Comic Opera.

If anybody has doubted the necessity of a radical reform in the Appraiser's office a reading of the last two days' testimony before the Fairchild Commission must have convinced him. Assistant Appraiser Goode, for example, testified that his only qualification for appraising cotton, linen and rubber goods and laces was drawn from his experience as a plasterer. He admitted that he has not yet learned or tried to learn anything about the market value of the goods he appraises or about the distinctions between different goods of the same class. In brief, he swears that he brings only ignorance and guesswork to a task which requires expert knowledge and skilled judgment for its performance. Then came J. Stanley Isaacs, who testified yesterday that he knows very little about the market price of goods in his own division and that he is accustomed to sign invoices for other assistants, not only without knowing anything about their correctness, but without troubling himself even to look at them and find out what they contain. The whole thing would be as amusing as comic opera were it not that all this is done to the commerce of the country and the revenues of the nation—not only the ignorant guessing, but the abominable frauds to which it gives free license.—New York World.

McKinleyism.

"Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad" applies with full force to the Republican party. In 1890 it went into the campaign for the election of Congressmen with the McKinley bill as its chief war cry. It learned nothing by its defeat of that year, but again declared for McKinleyism in the Presidential campaign of last year and again went down to defeat. Unable to find anything else around which to gather its scattered and defeated following, it again opens up the campaign in Ohio with McKinley as its standard bearer and high protection as its war cry. It is well. When the old Whig party turned its back on the masses of the people and made high protection its sole issue it went down to an inglorious defeat, never to be heard from again. History repeats itself, and the Republican party is following the same road to ruin. It reached its high tide with the election of Harrison and has lost steadily in every election since. New issue and new measures are crowding to the front and demanding recognition. Free trade no longer scares the farmer and the laboring man laughs to scorn the threadbare argument that protection makes high wages. The country has moved away from the Republican party. It has performed its mission and over its tombstone can be written the epitaph, died of too much protection.—Kansas Democrat.

Our Exports to Australia.

The Iron Age of June 22 says: "Statistics of imports into New South Wales for 1891 show that in agricultural implements the United States shipped to that colony $33,467 worth. She also supplied hardware to the extent of $502,747. Other American goods furnished in quantities were gas fittings, furniture, wearing apparel, canned goods, kerosene and oils, and lamps, of which the large bulk of the imports in that line were furnished by the United States. Most of the light buggies used in New South Wales are also of American manufacture."

Such being the case why are our manufacturers of these articles protected from competition at home by high tariff duties?

There is but one answer—to enable them to charge higher prices to home consumers. And this is exactly what we see done. In some cases this is just what our laws expect. The manufacturers are compelled to pay a duty on their raw materials, with the understanding that the duty will be refunded if the materials are exported in the form of finished products. This is done to allow our manufacturers to compete abroad, and is an admission that protective duties enhance prices and tax the consumer. The Government, however, being inclined to favor foreign rather than our own consumers, passes a "drawback" law which exempts foreigners from all burdens due to our protection laws. Certainly the foreigner ought not to swear at this generous treatment.

But there are other cases, and they are far more numerous and comprise practically all of the articles exported to New South Wales, where the raw materials are not imported and where manufacturers who sell abroad at lower prices than at home—as they often do in the cases of agricultural implements, hardware, etc.—need a duty, and use it, as the New York Tribune says, only as an "instrument of extortion." To do this they must combine into unlawful monopolies, which prevent that natural competition that would give our consumers the benefits of low prices. The tariff system is the supporter of trusts and of high prices—at home. Abolish protection and home-made goods will be sold as cheaply to us as to foreigners. And would this be asking too much of our manufacturers? The people have answered "No," and now expect Congress to pass a tariff bill which shall not put Americans at a disadvantage in their own markets.

Custom House Exists for Manufacturers.

Is it really indecent for the manufacturers to assume that the custom house is run for their own private benefit, when the law evidently endeavors to put duties above the importing point in order to surround the work of importation with such vexations, hardships and uncertainties as greatly to hamper business, and when every possible doubt in regard to the rate of duty on any manufactured article is always settled against the importer, even though the chances are strong that money is being illegally collected which will have to be refunded afterwards? What other inference should a manufacturer draw? As a gentleman connected with a highly protected interest said to an Economist man, in talking over the inconvenience of the numerous refunds of illegally collected duties, the necessity for which is now bothering our depleted National Treasury: "Well, we don't care much about that; the collection of the higher duty served its purpose in keeping prices up higher; and the goods having now been all sold we don't care what duties are refunded." Is it not a fair assumption that the custom house is largely run for the private benefit of our manufacturers, and is it not so boldly claimed and acknowledged by the putative father of our present customs legislation?—Dry Goods Economist.

Insulting Popular Intelligence.

Was there ever anything like the contempt for the intelligence of the American people shown by such thick and thin partisan organs of the Republican party as the New York Press? Says the Press:

"The platform on which Grover Cleveland was elected was a protest against progress and a declaration of war upon prosperity. The return of the Democratic party to complete control of the Government, unless the solemn declaration of principles put forth by the Chicago convention was a tissue of deliberate falsehoods, meant ruin for American industries and debasement for American currency."

Leaving the "solid South" entirely out of the account, Cleveland received pluralities in the States of Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin and California. In other words, a plurality of the voters in these great Northern States indorsed "a protest against progress and a declaration of war upon prosperity," and voted in favor of "ruin for American industries and debasement for American currency." A more contemptuous estimate of popular intelligence in this republic could not be imagined.—New York Evening Post.

Depends Upon Their Politics.

Whatever may be the uncertainty as regards changes in the tariff, it does not seem to be so great as to prevent the starting of factories here by firms who up to the present have imported all their gloves. One large importing firm has already started making gloves in this country, with the intention of enlarging later. On the other hand, a domestic manufacturer of gloves which compete with the imported goods has stopped production until the tariff question shall have been decided.—Dry-Goods Economist.

No part of the speech of the Hon. Wm. J. Bryan last night was so much applauded as that in which he advocated an income tax. The demand for this tax is growing. The press is taking it up, and all sections of the people are talking the matter over. The average citizen cannot understand why incomes should not be taxed when so many of the necessaries of life are subject to tribute. An income tax of the right sort and properly graded would be the easiest of all taxes and as just as any that could be laid. The income tax idea is marching on.—Atlanta Journal.

The Flaring Bonnet.

Another fashionable vulgarity exhibited at the places of amusement is one that is common only in America. In Europe, no lady is permitted to enter a theater or opera house wearing a bonnet or hat that may in any degree obstruct a view of the stage by those who sit behind them. In this country, and especially in this city, it is not uncommon for a lady to wear a flaring hat or poke bonnet that practically forbids a score of spectators from seeing the stage except by bobbing around the sides of the obstructive head-gear. This nuisance is not confined to fashionable people, but well-bred people should know that it is offensively vulgar, and, if they would banish the flaring bonnet, and appear at the theaters and at opera in suitable headdress, the imitators of fashion would speedily follow them in the reform. It is simply an exhibition of vulgarity for an intelligent woman to appear in public with a hat or bonnet that interferes with the enjoyment of those around her. Respect for others, high or low, is the first attribute of the gentleman or lady, and any violation of the rule, in public or private, is simply vulgarity.—Philadelphia Times.

When Jackson was President a boarding-house keeper in Washington called on him to complain that a certain department clerk had not paid his bill for months. Jackson looked at her mildly and said, "Get his note for what he owes you and bring it to me." A few days after she came back with the note. The President wrote on the back of it, "Andrew Jackson," and said, "Take it to the bank and they will give you the money—and that note will be paid." He was right. It was paid when the clerk found out who indorsed it.

Wave Tossed.

Sea sick voyagers suffer unspeakable tortures. Then if Hostetter's Stomach Bitters is resorted to the tortures cease. Yachting parties, ocean fishermen, nervous, sickly people, whom the jarring of a railway train affects much in the same way as the tossing of the surges do one who crosses the Atlantic for the first time, should be mindful of this and be provided with an adequate supply of the Bitters. This incomparable stomachic will promptly settle a stomach outrageously disturbed, is a capital antidote to malaria and nervous complaints, remedies constipation and biliousness, and counteracts a tendency to rheumatism. Besides this, it compensates for a loss of energy consequent upon undue exertion or nervous anxiety, and averts the effects of exposure in inclement weather and the wearing of damp clothing. Both appetite and sleep are promoted by it, and general health rapidly improves through its use.

A Bird of Very Bad Morals.

The cowbird, like the European cuckoo, never pairs, builds a nest, or hatches its own young. The flocks that frequent cow pastures are composed of males and females that consort together promiscuously, and the female, when the time comes, leaves her companions and sets out alone to find the nest of some small bird in which she lays the egg, and then leaves it entirely to the care of the unwilling, and often unwitting foster-parents. As a rule, this means the destruction of the bird's own brood, for the young cowbird, being hatched sooner than the true offspring, monopolizes all attentions and the other young, if hatched at all, die of unavoidable neglect.—Scribner.

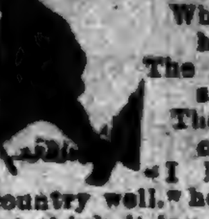
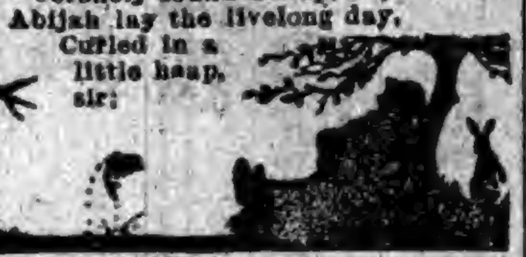
ABIJAH'S FOURTH OF JULY.



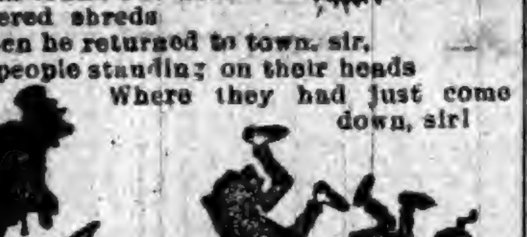
Abijah Stone strolled off alone
While yet the morn was hazy;
The neighbors' boys made such a noise,
They almost drove him crazy.
"I love my country well," he said,
"But think it is a sin, sir,
To spoil July's sweet jubilee
By making such a din, sir!"

So, in a nook beside a brook,
Serenely sound asleep, sir,
Abijah lay the livelong day,
Curled in a little heap, sir;



While in the town the brass band brayed,
And cannons boomed their thunder,
Until a very small boy made
A most tremendous blunder.

For, just at dark, he dropped a spark
Where sparks are very worst, sir;
A blinding flash—a frightful crash—
A powder keg had burst, sir!
Abijah found but scattered shreds
When he returned to town, sir,
And people standing on their heads
Where they had just come down, sir!



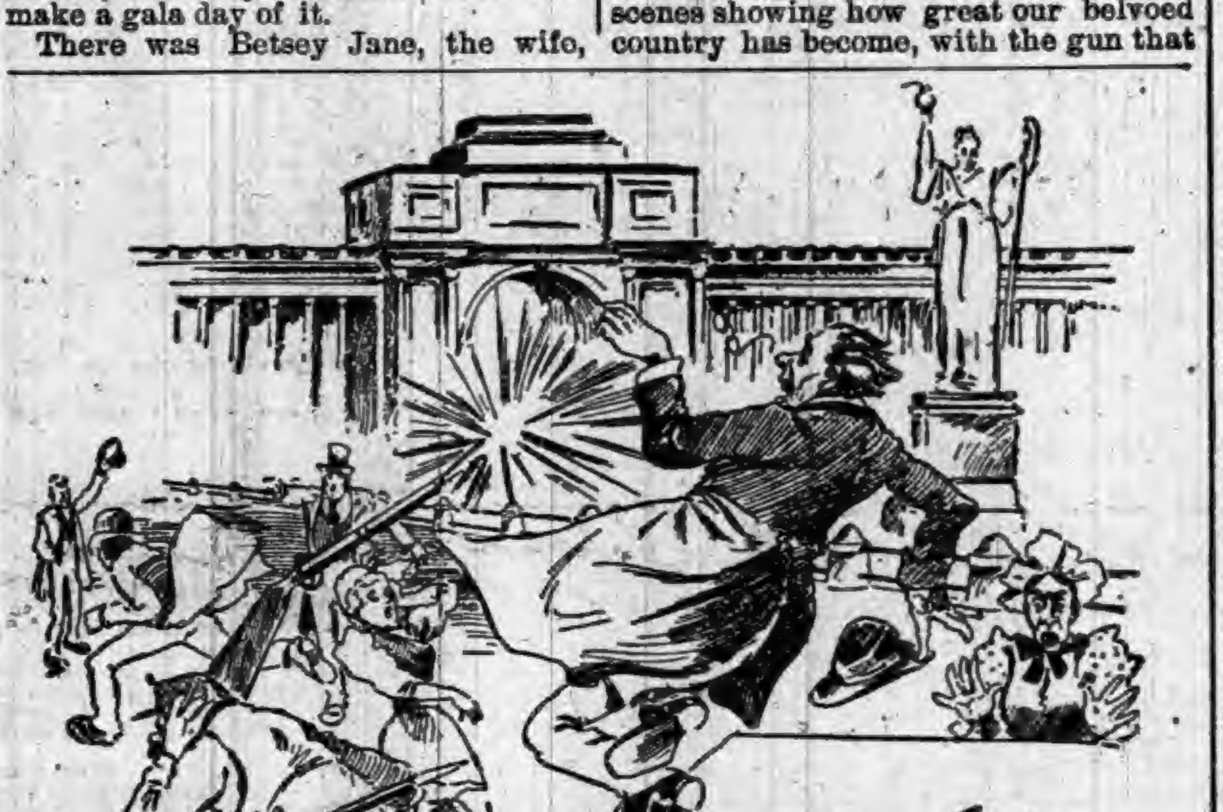
—Jack Bennett, in St. Nicholas.

THE 4TH AT THE FAIR

"Hurrah for the Fourth of July, George Washington, Christopher Columbus, and the great World's Fair!"

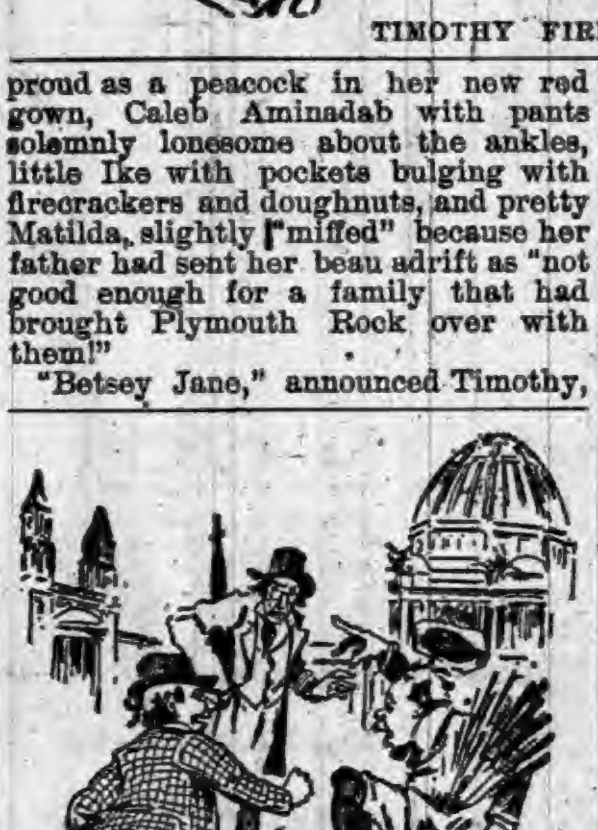
Timothy John Putterbaugh uttered the words in a ringing cheer as he entered the grounds of the Columbian Exposition on the morning of July 4. He was the most patriotic celebrator in America, the happiest man in the whole world, for Revolutionary blood ran in his loyal veins. Timothy and his family had come to the Fair to celebrate, and they were determined to make a gala day of it.

There was Betsey Jane, the wife, proud as a peacock in her new red gown, Caleb Aminadab with pants solemnly lonesome about the ankles, little Ike with pockets bulging with firecrackers and doughnuts, and pretty Matilda, slightly "miffed" because her father had sent her beau adrift as "not good enough for a family that had brought Plymouth Rock over with them!"



TIMOTHY FIRES A SALUTE.

"Betsey Jane," announced Timothy, oratorically, "here's the World's Fair, the great and gelorious aggregation of architectooral magnitude, that shows what a big country we've got. To hum the crops are booming, and money's no object for anything you want, from peanuts to pop. We've come to celebrate. Your old dad will set 'em up. Whoop, by gosh!" and Timothy lit an enormous firecracker.



IKE WAS ON FIRE.

"Here, old man, no firing off young cannons allowed," called out one of those promiscuous young men known as Columbian guards.

"No firing! No snap, boom, bang on the glorious Fourth! What have I struck? An alien shore, or the rock-bound coast of my native land?" demanded Timothy, with pathetic irony. "You stop me? Timothy J. Putterbaugh is prohibited from letting off the bottled-up fizz of patriotism swelling in his bosom. Gosh all hemlocks! is this the land of Washington and pumpkin pie? Suffering Cornelius! think of '76! If the firing had stopped then where would we be?"

Just then a dapper youth snatched the remainder of the pack from Timothy, and applied his cigarette to the fuse.

Pop—bang—boom! A small cyclone seemed to rend the spot.

"Didn't I tell you not to fire any more crackers?" roared the guard, rushing back and drawing his cheese knife.

"I didn't fire any more crackers," grinned Timothy, "I'm busy speechifying. Reckon they went off by spontaneous combustion! Young feller," to the real culprit, "shake! You've saved the country, and if there's a 'for drinking purposes only' barrel handy, I'll fill you up free."

The Putterbaughs wandered on, but Timothy was not subdued.

"Betsey Jane," he remarked, "they've spiled the fun, but wait till night."

"What's going to happen then?"

"Fireworks, they say. Then you shall hear from me! I came prepared." And Timothy tapped a mysterious-looking parcel he carried.

"What you got there?" asked the perplexed Betsey.

"Never you mind—you'll know when celebration begins. I'm bilin' over with enthusiasm, and it's got to bust out somewhere! Look, Betsey, there's the genuine, original and only liberty bell that rang out the independence of this great country over a hundred years ago!"

As they passed relic after relic of revolutionary fame, Timothy got warmed up and a battle-scarred flag evoked a terrific strain from "Hail Columbia."

Timothy was growing enthusiastic, when shrieks and firecrackers mingled in a sudden and exciting chorus.

"Land o' Goshen! What's broke loose?" gasped Timothy, grabbing up his youngest scion.

Ike was blubbering, and Ike was on fire. Some mischievous boy had slipped a lighted match into his pocket, and "set off two packs!"

"Dad! you won't wallop me, will you?" he sniffled.

"I would remark not!" cried Timothy, smoothing out about a foot of charred cloth. "A glorious salute at the very baptismal font of liberty! Come to my arms, my son! I'm proud of you!"

At dark they followed a crowd to where some elaborate fireworks were to be sent off.

"Timothy, what are you going to do?" said Betsey Jane, alarmedly, as the old man made a spring for a platform.

Stripping the covering from his mysterious parcel, he waved it at the throng—an old rusty musket.

"Fellow-citizens," declaimed Timothy, "I wish to speak a few words. I'm Timothy Putterbaugh—biggest farmer in Grundy County, law-abiding citizen, direct descendant of Captain Oziah Putterbaugh, who fought, bled and died for his country at Lexington, and served later in the war of 1812."

"Good for Oziah!" sang out a chair-pusher.

"In my hand," muttered Timothy, excitedly, "I hold what? A gun. When you gaze at the great Krupp cannon, the fifty-shots-a-minute rifles on exhibition here, and see how easy it is to have a whole war over and done inside of an hour, do you consider that our noble forefathers had no such—no such——"

"Cinch," suggested a bystander.

"Cinch 'll do. No; they had a gun like this. This very gun. Yes, fellow-citizens, this identical gun was at the battle of Bunker Hill. My grandfather fired it. I loaded it this morning with a royal old charge. They've squelched the old man all day. Amid all this grandeur of all nations, scenes showing how great our belvoed country has become, with the gun that celebrated in 1776 I fire a salute to the grandest Fourth of July the world has ever seen—1893!"

"Here, none of that!" cried a guard approaching.

He spoke too late. Bang!!—1,893 distinct reverberations seemed to follow a flare like a cannon, a report like the explosion of a powder magazine.

Children shrieked, women fainted. The gun kicked and knocked the irrepressible Timothy flat, flew from his hand, whacked the guard over the head, and fell in the midst of the crowd.

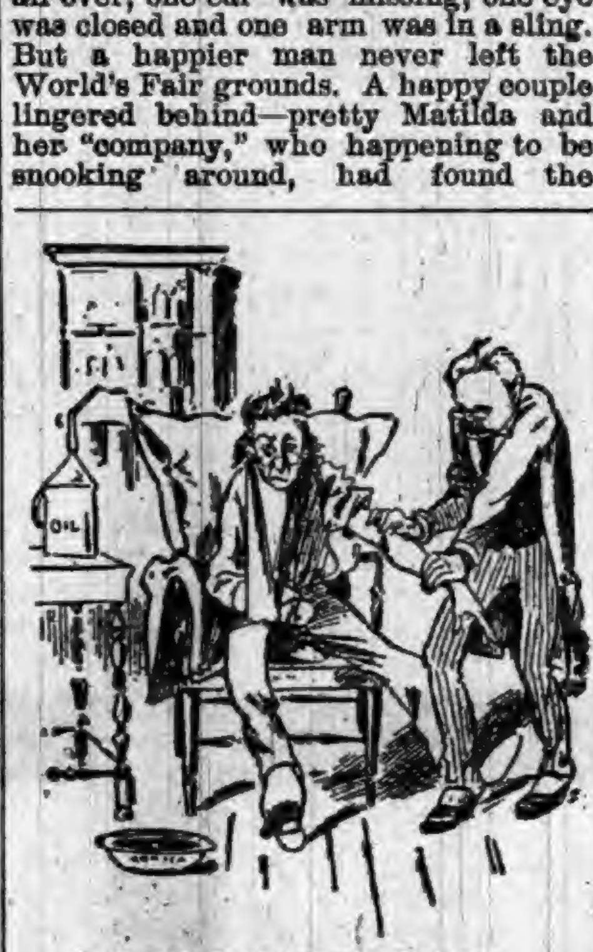
"I arrest you——" began the officer.

"No, you don't!" retorted Timothy. "Betsey Jane, 'tend to the kids; your old man's got to hustle."

"Stop! stop!" A hundred voices sounded the warning, as the spry Timothy leaped to an adjoining platform. At that moment the fireworks had begun, and the reckless Timothy had landed squarely into a fiery, hissing nest of them. They saw a hundred pin-wheels encircle him with their spitting tongues of flame—they saw a spurt of Roman candles strike his hat and riddle it. They saw Timothy John Putterbaugh aureoled with a circle of blue, red and green lights like a phœnix, and then he uttered one rousing yell of triumph amid a whole battery of exploding rockets.

"E pluribus unum, star-spangled banner, hurrah for the Fourth of July!" screamed the grand old patriot. "Betsey Jane, on this grand and glorious occa——"

When they got Timothy John to a tank and put him out, and to the emergency hospital and greased him all over, one ear was missing, one eye was closed and one arm was in a sling. But a happier man never left the World's Fair grounds. A happy couple lingered behind—pretty Matilda and her "company," who happening to be snooking around, had found the old revolutionary gun, and Timothy took him to his arms literally for restoring the time-honored relic.



IN THE EMERGENCY HOSPITAL.

"Betsey Jane," chuckled Timothy, as he looked back from the elevated railway train at the glare of the World's Fair grounds, "I did my duty! I fired the grand national salute, I went up in a blaze of patriotic glory, and I never had and I never will have a Fourth of July equal to the Fourth of July, 1893!"

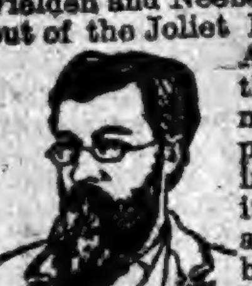
PARDONED THE REDS.

GOV. ALTGELD SETS THE ANARCHISTS FREE.

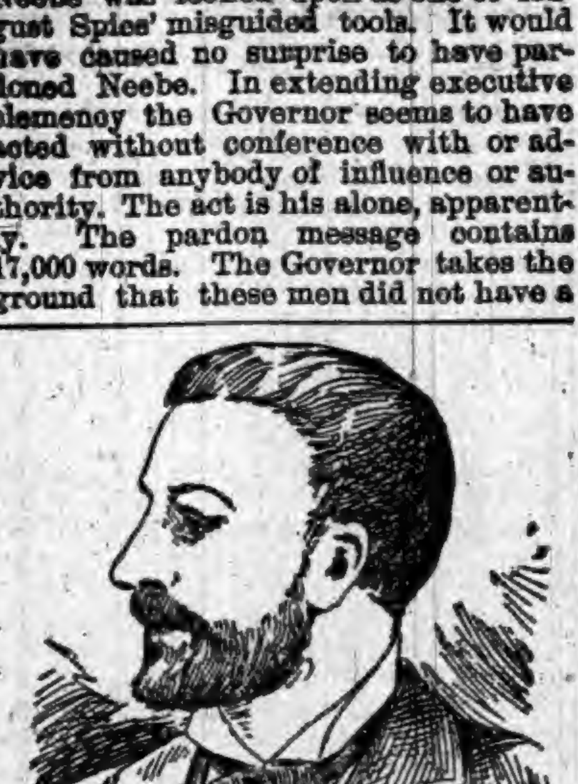
Schwab, Fielden and Neebe Are Liberated from the Joliet Penitentiary After Nearly Seven Years' Service—The Governor Scores the Courts.

Prison Doors Flung Wide.

The Chicago anarchists, Schwab, Fielden and Neebe, have been pardoned out of the Joliet Penitentiary by Gov. Altgeld. The news of the pardon caused the most profound surprise at Joliet, according to a dispatch, but it is said to have been anticipated in Chicago by the friends of the imprisoned men. Schwab, according to the Joliet correspondent, has been looked upon as one of the most dangerous men in the horrible conspiracy that led up to the Haymarket massacre; Fielden was always considered a misguided but honest man; and Neebe was looked upon as one of August Spies' misguided tools. It would have caused no surprise to have pardoned Neebe. In extending executive clemency the Governor seems to have acted without conference with or advice from anybody of influence or authority. The act is his alone, apparently. The pardon message contains 17,000 words. The Governor takes the ground that these men did not have a fair trial and that the court was prejudiced. He scores Judge Gary and Chief of Police Bonfield severely.



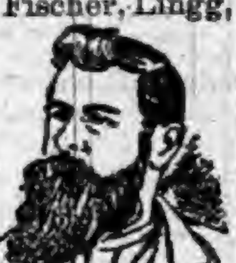
MICHAEL SCHWAB.



GOV. ALTGELD.

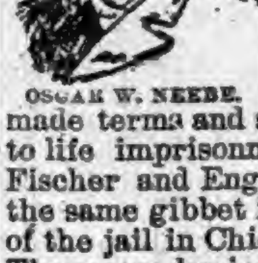
Schwab, Fielden and Neebe were sentenced to State's prison on the charge of complicity in the Haymarket massacre on the night of May 4, 1886.

The details of the trial are too well remembered to demand recounting. Spies, Fielden, Parsons, Fischer, Lingg, Schwab and Engel were sentenced to death and Neebe, whom many thought innocent, to fifteen years in the penitentiary. The case was carried up and fought with great desperation in the Supreme Court of Illinois by the prisoners' lawyers, but the court finally adjudged the verdict correct in law and the sentence of the court was carried out in respect to Spies, Parsons, Fischer, Engel and Neebe. Louis Lingg killed himself horribly with a fulminating cap in the jail on the day preceding that set for the hanging.



SAMUEL FIELDEN.

A determined attempt to secure a commutation of sentence was made before the execution. It was joined in by many, especially in behalf of Parsons, who was well known and popular, and it might have been granted if that wild fellow had consented to recant in his faith. But he refused to do so, and Gov. Oglesby was obdurate in refusing to grant a commutation to any who did not weaken. Spies, worn as his friends say by long confinement, consented to admit his error, but Oglesby, considering him the leader, would give him no mercy. Fielden and Schwab made terms and sentence was cut down to life imprisonment. Spies, Parsons, Fischer and Engel were hanged from the same gibbet in the north corridor of the jail in Chicago, on Nov. 11, 1887. They were buried on Nov. 13 in Waldheim Cemetery, where a monument in their memory has just been unveiled. The others were quickly taken to Joliet Penitentiary.



OSCAR W. NEEBE.

For the last three or four years strong efforts have been made to secure their pardon, and an amnesty association was formed in Chicago, which has worked unceasingly to this end. Many petitions were presented to Gov. Fifer during his term of office praying for executive clemency in the case of these men, but he refused to listen to the appeals.

Unveiled Their Monument.

Sunday afternoon, in Waldheim Cemetery, near Chicago, a stately monument to the memory of Spies, Parsons, Fischer, Engel, and Lingg, the executed anarchists, was unveiled. It rested on the same spot which marked their several graves. President Schmidinger, of the society which erected the monument, delivered an address, reciting matters of interest in connection with the movement. About 3,000 persons witnessed the ceremony. The monument was draped in the red which the organization so fondly clings to as an emblem of its order, and the men, women, and children who were grouped around the monument wore red in profusion and talked of "martyrs to the cause of human rights."

The Best Shampoo.

A dermatologist of high standing says that the proper way to shampoo the head is to use some pure soap made into a "good lather on the head," with plenty of warm water, and rubbed into the scalp with the fingers or with rather a stiff brush that has long bristles. When the scalp is very sensitive, borax and water, or the yolks of three eggs, beaten in a pint of lime water, are recommended instead of soap and water. After rubbing the head thoroughly in every direction and washing out the hair with plenty of warm water, or with douches of warm water, alternating with cold, drying the hair with a bath towel, a small quantity of vaseline or sweet almond oil should be rubbed into the scalp. The oil thus applied is used in the place of the oil that has been removed by washing, and to prevent the hair from becoming brittle.

Merits of the Esquimau Dog.

Lieut. Peary was asked the other day what kinds of dogs he would take north with him. He replied:

"The Esquimau dogs which we brought back on our return from our former expedition. Any other dog than an Esquimau dog will not last three days in the cold weather there, while the Esquimau will endure a degree of cold that is surprising. Some of the dogs I had before would travel for three or four days without eating food, and they slaked their thirst with the snow. A pound of pemican a day to each was the usual rations. They do not feel the cold and will not seek shelter except when the wind is blowing. I have seen then curl up to sleep, apparently perfectly comfortable, on the snow, with no covering, when the thermometer was forty degrees below zero. Any other dog that I know of could not endure this."

Perplexed Over the Mistake.

What a woman doesn't know about newspapers isn't worth knowing. The other morning Mrs. Blank was talking to her husband.

"I noticed in the Daily Hoodoo that Mr. Blifkins died Sunday."

"It's a mistake, my dear," replied the husband; "he died on Monday."

"But the paper said Sunday."

"I know it, but it was an error in the print."

"I thought so, too, at first, but I got a half dozen copies of the paper, and it was the same in all of them. They certainly couldn't have made the mistake over and over again."

The husband tried to convince her, but it was no use, and he gave it up.

Systematic Workers.

The bee works as systematically as if under military discipline. Pollen for "bee bread" has to be secured as well as honey for a rainy day—or for those humans who ruthlessly take from the bees the reward of their hard-earned labors. But a recent author asserts that when a bee starts from the hive for pollen, not the sweetest nectar will tempt the creature from its task, while the honey gatherer does nothing else but gather sweets till the day's labor ceases.

It's Hard Work for a Woman.

The feeling of superiority in the sterner sex is inborn. "Mamma, do you think you'll go to heaven?" said Jack thoughtfully looking into his mother's face.

"Yes, dear, if I'm good," said the little mother cautiously wondering what would come next.

"Then please be good for papa and I would be so lonesome without you."—Kate Field's Washington.

The Offices Seek the Men.

Frenchburg, Ky., is in a sorry plight. It has recently been chartered as a town of the sixth class, and eighteen offices are provided for in the law. As there are but thirteen men eligible to hold offices there is some heavy thinking being done in Frenchburg.

A Watch Electrocuted.

Lightning played a queer trick the other day out in Montana. A bolt fell on a farmer working in a field on his ranch near Augusta, and besides killing him played havoc with the metal that he carried in his clothes. The current struck his silver watch, burned a hole through the edge near the case spring, and passed on entirely through the watch between the outer and inner cases, and made its exit near the stem.

A match could be inserted in the hole. When the body was found the watch had stopped, but when it was taken from the pocket it started ticking again, and has been keeping excellent time since. The blades of the dead man's knife were welded together, and the brass ends were melted.

A Peculiar Railway Accident.

The carelessness of a guard or brakeman on a Germany railway recently caused considerable damage. It was a bitter cold morning, and he put the brakes down hard on his car at a station where he had a short rest. When the train was started again, he forgot to take off the brake until the wheels, which had slid solidly along the track, were worn off fully two inches. Suddenly the guard remembered his negligence and let off the brake, but this was injudicious as the wheels, now no longer round, acted as so many hammers and before the accident was discovered they had broken the steel rails in no less than eighty-one places.

A Cure for Bunions.

Take grease, lark, tallow, or suet melted with oil, or any fresh grease, and work into it salicylic acid till you make a salve of proper consistency; spread on a piece of cloth, bind on the corn, wart, or bunion, and keep on for three days and nights; bathe in warm water and peel off the flakes which the salve has loosened. If it is not removed apply again until it is. The acid can be had at any drug store and will cost but a few cents to make enough of the salve to effect a cure.

The After Effects Cured

Mr. Bilger writes: "I had a bad attack of the Grippe; after a time caught cold and had a second attack; it settled in my kidneys and liver, and Oh! such pain and misery in my back and legs.

The Physicians' medicine and other things that I used made no impression, and I continually grew worse until I was a physical wreck, and given up to die.

Father bought me a bottle of Dr. Kilmer's SWAMP-ROOT, and before I had used all of the second bottle I felt better, and to-day I am just as well as ever. A year has passed and not a trace of the Grippe is left. SWAMP-ROOT saved my life."

Royal Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

CORRESPONDENCE

WATERLOO.

Ella Phillips from Hicksville is at home at present.

Mrs. Juliette Dickinson and Mrs Hattie Ettinger are improving in health.

Frank Beidler and son returned from Chicago Monday, where they have spent a week.

Many people from here and north of here went to Auburn the fourth to help celebrate.

A procession of bicyclists passed through Wayne street on their way to Auburn Tuesday.

Phillip Plum was again on the street yesterday, but looked rather wilted, as if being confined to the house did not agree with him.

Mr. Miller, the spectacle man, as he is called, has been in town for a week and is said to have supplied many persons with spectacles.

Our new postmaster Will Getts, will not take possession of his office before January. He very wisely keeps on with his regular business as usual.

A new cement crossing has just been made from the DeKalb bank, across to Huber's grocery, also from Campbell's to the opposite corners south.

John Peterman sold his farm of forty acres, last Monday. He said it was so sudden, he did not know where he should go, but he has since concluded we hear, to move back to Waterloo.

Scott Lotzenheiser died Monday afternoon. He has been sick for nearly two years, and recently his wife has thought he might recover; he himself has been hopeful throughout. The funeral takes place Thursday, at 3 p. m.

Dr. H. B. Fry preached Sunday morning and evening to a good sized audience His sermon was of the lame beggar who was healed at the gate of the temple. The lesson drawn from it, was the necessity of faith and of doing good to others.

F. E. Adams, ticket agent for the Lake Shore road, has, within the week moved to Bryan. His moves are almost as frequent as a Methodist minister when they were yearly; but in his case, as every change seems a promotion and for the better, he probably finds it pays.

Mrs Huber and Mrs. Faust who were thrown from their buggy a week ago Sunday are recovering from their many bruises although Mrs. H, has carried about a bruised and swollen face and forehead, and blackened eye, looking as if she had been in a big squabble of some kind.

BUTLER.

S. G. Stone has the boss soda fountain in town.

Charles Rohrbaugh, an old and well known citizen of Franklin township died last week.

E. A. Leonard, one of the trusted employes of the manufacture company has left Butler for South Dakota.

Our visitors to the World's Fair continue, perhaps a dozen Butler people are there now with many more to follow.

Our oldest inhabitants say they never saw money so hard to get, yet Butler's contribution to the fair will be several thousands of hard earned dollars.

Our Bicycle works are already in operation and about ten men are already employed. Extensive changes in building and much new machinery is being put in. The company expects to employ about sixty hands.

Dr. James I Sheldon and wife of near LosAngeles, Cal., formerly well known residents of Butler, are visiting among their many old friends here. They have been in the west for about twenty years. Mr. Sheldon shows the effect of his twenty years absence very plainly.

Daniel Lidy, of Kansas, an old and well known former resident of this township, is visiting among friends here. It is somewhat amusing to see him meet our older citizens whom he once knew. He has been away from Butler twenty-five years, and while he has changed some, many others have changed more.

A tramp whose name we have not learned was injured on the railroad some distance east of here in Ohio, was brought here last week. His injuries were so great that amputation of a limb was necessary. The shock proved too great for him and he died last Friday. Some carelessness seems to have been exercised in allowing him to be brought here from Ohio and the result is our county is put to the expense of one or two hundred dollars, that should have been borne by Ohio.

Died at his residence two and one-half miles east of Butler, Ind., June 25, 1893, after an illness of many weeks, David McDannel, in the 78th year of his life

David McDannel was born in Stark county Ohio, Feb. 11, 1816. He grew up upon a farm and received a liberal education for the times. He learned the carpenter trade and worked at it many years of his life. Oct. 27, 1839 he was united in marriage to Annie Gunsenhouser, of his native county. To this union were born six children, one son and five daughters, two only surviving. Their only son John became a mute, and was run over and killed on the L. S. R R Mr. McDannel moved to DeKalb county just fifty years ago, settled on the farm where he died and erected the first frame house in the township, which by careful repairs is still well preserved, and in which he resided at his death. He was a member of the Lutheran church and lived a christian life and was loved and honored by all who knew him His aged wife survives him.

CORUNNA.

Mrs. Wise sr., is quite ill at this writing.

Minnie Stonebraker who has declined again and is growing worse.

The crops are looking very well at present especially corn and potatoes.

Mr. and Mrs. W. H Trumbull spent Sunday at her mother's home north of town.

There was not much wheat cut on the fourth this year on account of its being too green.

Henry Kline is building a fine barn, which adds much to the appearance of his property.

Bicycle riding is becoming a favorite pastime with most of our citizens and is much indulged in.

A great many of our people went to surrounding towns to celebrate the fourth and to enjoy a holiday away from home.

Little Lester Monroe fell from an apple tree one day last week and was quite seriously hurt but is recovering faster than was at first expected.

Although our national holiday was not duly celebrated in this town, the small boy did his share of the usual program with a hearty good will.

The entertainment by the lookout committee of the Y. P. S. C E that was given in the Disciple church Sunday eve was a grand success. The recitations were especially good and deserving of comment.

Mrs O. F. Rudolph who has been sick since her return from the fair, is slowly improving and is able to be about the house again She is not discouraged but says she will return their in the fall as soon as she becomes strong enough to go as it is too grand to be missed.

There will be another contest here in the near future. The young people of this place will do the declaiming, while the judges will come from Kendallville. They also will bring their own music. A fine time is expected. This contest is trying for the Demorest gold medal we understand, the other being for the silver medal.

W. H. Drury our station agent of this place has gone to Burr Oak, Mich, where he has a good position and will soon move his family there. W. H. Trumbull is promoted to his place with D. S. Shook as baggage man. We are sorry to lose Mr. Drury and wife from our midst as they are very desirable citizens and neighbors.

SUMMIT.

J. A. Krum of Hudson was in town Saturday.

Mrs. Effie Conrad of Ashley was in town Thursday.

H. P. R. Lawson went to Ft Wayne on business Thursday.

Milo Foster and wife visited friends in New Era over Sunday.

Theresa and Lena Schiffi of Angola, visited their parents Sunday.

A. McDowel and Mr. Garmire of Hudson were on our streets Monday.

Deserving Praise.

We desire to say to our citizens, that for years we have been selling Dr. King's New Discovery for consumption, Dr. King's New Life Pills, Bucklen's Arnica Salve and Electric Bitters, and have never handled remedies that sell as well, or that have given such universal satisfaction. We do not hesitate to guarantee them every time, and we stand ready to refund the purchase price, if satisfactory results do not follow their use. These remedies have won their great popularity purely on their merits. Robbins & McCords druggists. 1

Fine Surgical Operation.

Auburn people will be interested in the success of its former citizens. So we clip the following communication from the Churubusco Truth, written for that paper by Dr. James W. Squires whose early home was in Jackson township, where his people still live. He writes;

Mr. G——, aged 30 years, a Baptist minister, only a few months from Eastern Tennessee, came to my office, with an enlargement in the neck, under the skin immediately above, the right side, and pressing upon larynx.

Upon examination I informed him that there was a foreign body present that ought to be taken out. He said: "Yes, there is something there that didn't grow there. Twenty-two years ago, when a lad of eight years and living on a farm among the mountains of Eastern Tennessee, our chickens had secreted themselves in a brush pile. I resolved, boy-like that out they must come, and according mounted the brush pile, and then by yelling and jumping expected to frighten them from their retreat. Now the brush pile, being mellowed by the summer's heat and sunshine and winter's clouds and rain of two or three years, was too tender for one of my size, and I broke through; the broken end of a limb, striking me under the chin, penetrating the skin and broke off. I don't remember whether I succeeded in dislodging the chickens or not, but do distinctly remember that I didn't forget to yell. The wound healed readily, and that piece of timber has been there ever since. Father took me to two or three doctors, who informed him that it was a dangerous place to operate, and advised him not to molest is as long as it held its peace, but it has shifted and now interferes with my speech. When I raise my chin, it draws upon Adam's apple. It seems to be aching for a fuss."

I said to him: "The doctors of Eastern Tennessee probably place a higher estimate upon the lives of preachers than we northern doctors do. I can remove that body." "But isn't there danger of cutting off the jugular artery?" "Well, if I do, I'll tie it up and go on with my work, I'll do the work if I undertake it, let come what may."

With these encouraging words, I was permitted to operate.

I made a small incision over the end of the body, crowded the soft parts back, introduced a small artery-forceps, and drew out the body, which proved to be a piece of chestnut twig or limb—bark, timber and all— one inch in length, and as thick as an ordinary lead pencil, in a perfect state of preservation. Wound healed in a few days by first intention.

I was prompted to report this case by the report of a similar one in the April number of the International Journal of Surgery. JAMES W. SQUIRES, M. D.

Destroyed by Fire and Again at Work.

The Price Baking Powder company of Chicago, which is known throughout the country for the superior excellence of its baking powder, met with a serious loss on the morning of May 18, in the nearly total destruction by fire of its factory and offices. No sooner had the flames been subdued than the work of restoration commenced, and the company by prudent foresight, having had stored in outside warehouse a duplicate machinery, labels and supplies of raw material in preparation for any emergency was enabled by energetic management to resume manufacturing within a few days after the fire, thereby causing its customers but a trifling delay in the filling of their orders. Had the company not been so prepared the delay would have been very serious since it would have required months of time to get new machinery. It is now forty years since the goods manufactured by this company were first placed on the market, to Dr. Price, being due the distinction of having prepared the first can of Cream of Tartar Baking Powder ever manufactured in any country. It was a great discovery, superseding as it did the old way of using cream of tartar and soda separately, to say nothing of saleratus, with which the biscuits of early days were embittered. The Price Company has no connection whatever with any other baking powder company or manufacturers, notwithstanding representations to the contrary made by other manufacturers whose sole aim is to deceive the public and borrow the good name and fame acquired by the Price Cream Baking Powder, which is known all over the world as the purest and most perfect made.

HEART DISEASE 30 YEARS.

GRAND ISLAND, NEB., April 8th, 1892.

Dr. Miles Medical Co., Elkhart, Ind.

GENTLEMEN: I had been troubled with HEART DISEASE FOR THE LAST 30 YEARS, and although I was treated by able physicians and tried many remedies, I grew steadily worse until I WAS COMPLETELY PROSTRATED AND CONFINED TO MY BED WITHOUT ANY HOPE OF RECOVERY. I would have very bad sinking spells, when my pulse would stop beating altogether, and it was with the greatest difficulty that my circulation could be started, which would bring me back to consciousness again. While in this condition I tried your NEW HEART CURE, and began to improve from the first, and now I am able to do a good day's work for a man 68 years of age. I give DR. MILES' NEW HEART CURE all the credit for my recovery. It is over six months since I have taken any, although I keep a bottle in the house in case I should need it. I have also used your NERVE AND LIVER PILLS, and think a great deal of them. Z. AVERY.

Rebecca Wilkinson, of Brownsvalley, Ind., says: "I have been in a distressed condition for three years from nervousness, weakness of the stomach, dyspepsia and indigestion until my health was gone, I had been doctoring constantly with no relief. I bought one bottle of South American Nervine, which did me more good gond any $50 worth of doctoring I ever did in my life. AUBURN AND VICINITY.

Some Reminiscences of its Early Days and Pioneer Citizens.

1871—Continued.

At the May municipal election in a vote of 166, the republicans won by sixteen to twenty of a majority and elected the following named persons: Trustees, John Otto, John A. Cowan, George W. Stahl, John W Shaffer and Jacob P. Arnold; assessor, S B. Ward; treasurer, John B. Lobmiller; clerk, Richard Elson and for marshal, James L Penny. This last official deserves honorable mention for the faithful manner in which he labored to discharge his duties at a time when compensation was little and appreciation less.

The outgoing treasurer made a report of which the following is an abstract.

Received from Treasurer Klotz in 1870, $70 82. From county $267 54 cash and $608.51 of orders and from license and other sources $83 69, making a total of $762.97. There were redeemed of orders $750.30, leaving on hand $12.67. For lumber and work on streets allowances had been made in amount $913 91 and there were of orders outstanding May 1, $855 68.

In looking about for some point from which the public could give voice to their desire for improvement the public square attracted attention. Its features comprised in an excellent site and and a fine building gracing its center, were prospectively adorned by some shade trees brought in by public-spirited farmers, but the number was too few and the question arose: "Shall their ground remain barren or will the town's authorities beautify it by such an introduction of shade trees as would eventually form a fine grove?"

It was seen that indiference should give way to interest and that a higher standard of taste and order must be raised or the interests of the town would suffer. Strangers are influenced by life, energy and tidiness as well as by churches, schools and opportunities for money making and they are repelled by their absence. The time was opportune for a work of upheaval when old notions and styles should give way to order, taste and refinement.

In furtherance of this object a meeting was held at the court house well attended by leading citizens, at which it was decided that the square be improved and this sentiment found expression at a regular session of the town board held on April 3rd at the law office of W. H. Dills in an appropriation from the town treasury of $50 for the purpose of procuring trees to ornament the public grounds.

Wm A. Lowry, George Ensley and H. W. Ford were appointed a committee to obtain the trees and some four hundred of various kinds were set out by Mr. Ford assisted by Marshal Penny.

It was said by a townsman regarding the work: "If those trees should all live a few years hence, here will be a handsome little park to look upon instead of the hitherto bare ground." And he lived to see his prediction abundantly verified.

There was another meeting held at the previous place to discuss the general welfare at which dredging of Cedar creek was deemed a matter of paramount importance but the popular device found no action through lack of funds.

The bridges over this stream were rude and dilapidated and a reflection alike upon builders and the community.

The utility of a fire cistern near the public square was noted since in the event of a fire there was nothing with which to put it out—no water, no engine and no ladders, and an alarm could only assemble the population to look on helplessly as at a later destruction of the woolen mills. The only practical step accomplished of which satisfactory mention could be made for municipal showing was the construction of a new plank sidewalk from Main Street all the way to the depot, which was a boon to pedestrians in a relief from mud and water.

The national game of base ball had entered upon its career of prosperity and village and town had its nine as well as the city. Nothing behind in this respect Auburn's Wahalotas was a club of which her people were proud and with good reason as representative players.

Among notable games contested by this club was one played on their grounds north of the town about the last of June in which they were victors over the Quicksteps of Butler by a score of 73 to 50. Then were full 300 spectators of the game which occupied three hours and 40 minutes. The names of the players were as follows:

Wahalotas.		Quicksteps.
Frank Bacon	c.	Sloats,
W. Little,	s. s.	Carr,
G. C. Ralston,	1st b.	Haines,
H. Peterson,	p.	Hornberger,

Hall,	c. f.	J. Brown,
M. F. Long,	l. f.	J. Brown,
H. Little.	r. f.	B. Maxwell.

The umpire was J. W. McKay and the scorers were T. H. Bowers of Butler and W. H. Dills of Auburn.

W. W. Griswold had a finger broken in the fourth inning but manfully held his place till the close of the game. Col. Griswold long identified with Auburn and DeKalb county went west and settled in Minnesota, moved to Chanute, Neosha county Kansas in 1890, where he died Jan. 23, 1893.

WORLD'S FAIR BEAUTY SHOW.

Forty Handsome Young Women All in National Costume.

More than 5,000 people enjoy the "Beauty Show" at the World's Fair every day when the weather is fine. If this ratio is kept up, and there seems to be no reason to expect that it will not be, the number of visitors will surely reach 10,000 to 15,000 a day when the crowds that are confidently counted on put in their appearance at the fair.

The "Beauty Show," as it is almost universally called, is certainly one of the most novel and attractive of the special features at the exposition. These special attractions—about thirty in number and of as many different descriptions—are situated on both sides of Midway Plaisance, a portion of the exposition grounds, 600 feet wide and extending from the Woman's building westward for nearly a mile. In this strip of territory visitors may see gathered together a greater number of different nationalities and more variety of strange things than can be found assembled anywhere else on earth. Everyone who goes to the fair takes in the sights on Midway. It is the chance of a lifetime, and almost as instructive and entertaining as a couple of years of foreign travel.

But to return to the "Beauty Show." That, by the way, is not its technicial name. It is catalogued as the "International Dress and Costume Exhibit," and to this name its managers have added "World's Congress of Beauty." As a beauty show, it far transcends anything ever before attempted in that direction, and, it is believed, is the first exhibition of the sort possessing genuineness in the claim of being international.

But it is much more than a beauty show. The exhibit comprises between forty and fifty representatives of different nationalties, races and types, and each one is clad in distinctive national or racial dress or costume. Agents were were sent abroad to get these representatives and their costumes in their own countries, and to bring them to the Fair and all who visit the exhibit will readily agree that the work was well done.

It took faith on the part of the financial backers of the enterprise to carry it out, for the exhibit, as it stands to-day represents an expenditure of over $50,000. But the result shows that they knew what they were about. Thus far no other Midway attraction has drawn as well as this. It catches the crowd, both of men and women, and all who see it commend it to their friends.

Nearly all of the representatives are young women, and beautiful women at that. The reader need not conclude that this was wholly accidental. Women, rather than men, were selected because, as a rule, their costumes are more distinctive and attractive; and, in collecting a lot of young women from different countries for a public exhibition, who would not select beautiful ones rather than plain or homely specimens. Beautiful women, each one typical of her race or country, and striking costumes, true to the nationality of those who wear them, the result is a very instructive and popular exhibit.

The "Beauty Show" occupies a whole building by itself, and has pleasant surroundings. The building is 48x45 feet, two stories high, and is covered with staff, like all the other exposition buildings, thus having the appearance of being built of white marble. In front are lawns and graveled walks. From numerous flag-poles on the building float the colors of as many nations. The interior of the building truly presents a scene of splendor. One enters a great hall gaily decorated with multi-colored bunting and the flags of different nations. The windows are all darkened, and electric light illumines the hall by day as well as night. Around three sides of the room is a dais, carpeted and divided by polished brass railing into booths for the beauties. Each booth is nicely furnished, and in a conspicuous place is a satin banner bearing the name of the country which the occupant represents.

What do the beauties do? Well, the principal thing they do is to be looked at. Some do fancy work of one sort or another, some spin, some read, make embroidery, or engage in other light occupation, such as they are accustomed to at home. Nearly all chat freely with visitors, and answer the many questions which are propounded. They are paid a great many compliments, of course, and these they receive graciously if they are offered courteously. Occasionally a dude or ill-mannered person receives a squelching, which generally causes him to make haste from the vicinity.

At the end of the hall, opposite the entrance, is an oriental or harem scene in which there are five dark-eyed beauties lounging on divans or otherwise disposed in accord with the languid habits of the far east. Fatima, a regal beauty, is the queen of this booth, and occupies an exalted position in the center.

The costumes of the orientals are exceedingly gorgeous and rich. Three of the girls—an English, French and American—wear Worth gowns. These naturally excite the enthusiastic admiration of all the visitors of the gentler sex. The gowns cost from $1,000 to $1,500 each, and are the finest that the famous Paris costumer could make. The material was made specially for him and could not be duplicated elsewhere. This is Worth's only exhibit at the fair, he having declined a request from the French Commission, and also one from Mrs. Potter Palmer, president of the Board of Lady Managers, to make an exhibit in their departments.

The beauties enjoy themselves; they have a good time; they sleep and eat in the exhibit building, and have comfortable quarters and excellent board, much better in fact than the public restaurants of the fair provide. They have their half days off, and are allowed to go and come under proper restrictions So long as a girl acts in a lady-like and proper manner but little restriction is exercised over her. One would imagine that it would be a difficult task to manage so many pretty young women, who are conscious of their attractions, and who, it is to be supposed, have their jealousies of each other. However that may be, it seems to be done smoothly and satisfactorily. The girls seem happy, and the visitors are certainly well pleased. Compliments for the "Beauty Show" are heard on every hand.

When one stops to think of it, what reasonable criticism can be made of the idea of holding a beauty show? Beauty of face and form, especially of the female face and form, has engaged the talent of great painters and sculptors of all ages, and what they have produced on canvas and in marble has received universal admiration. Why should not the original be set up for admiration, and receive it, as well as the imitation, and even in greater degree? Sound reasoning will probably answer that it may be, if properly done. Visitors to the world's fair evidently think that the International Dress and Costume exhibit is a genuine beauty show, and not only that, but a model and perfectly proper one.

WENT DOWN TO DEATH

DREADFUL FATE OF BRAVE FIREMEN.

They Perish While Battling with Flames at the Windy City—Prize Fight at Roby, Ind.—Corbett and Jackson Matched and the Money Up.

DEATH

Comes in a Horrible Manner to a Large Number of Brave Firemen.

No less than thirty firemen lost their lives at the World's Fair Monday afternoon just before 2 o'clock. At that time the cold storage warehouse, just south of the Sixty-fourth street gate, caught fire in the top of the cupola, which rises fully 200 feet from the ground. Through this cupola the chimney passes. The cupola is built of wood, overlaid with staff, and is highly ornamented with columns and pillars. Near the top is a landing. The fire broke out about thirty feet above this. As soon as the firemen arrived about thirty-five or forty of them climbed up the ladders to this landing and were preparing to throw streams of water to the burning portion when the fire, which had eaten its way inside the staff to a point below, where the firemen stood, broke out with volcanic ferocity on all sides. An exclamation of horror went up from the lips of $20,000 people who had assembled about the building to see the fire. Five of the men saved themselves by sliding down the ropes. Before others could follow the flames had burned away the ropes. The unfortunate fellows who remained huddled together on the north side of the cupola were doomed. It was beyond the reach of any of the ladders and the crowd stood horror-stricken and helpless to rescue the crew. The flames ran higher until the men were almost concealed from view. At this moment one of the firemen sprang far out into the air and was dashed to pieces on the roof fully eighty feet below. Another and another followed his example, crazed by the awful heat and doubtless preferring to be killed by a fall than burned to death.

When five had jumped the upper portion of the cupola gave way and the remaining firemen were swallowed up in the seething mass of burning timbers.

SPORTING NEWS.

A Fight at Roby—Corbett and Jackson Matched.

The featherweight championship battle between Solly Smith of California, and Johnny Griffin of Braintree, Mich., took place at the Columbian Athletic Club, Roby, Ind., before a crowd of 7,000 people for a purse of $6,000, and the featherweight championship of the world. Smith knocked Griffin out in the fourth round.

J. Corbett, Denver, Ed Smith, and other prominent sports were present. When Corbett walked to the box the entire crowd stood up and yelled. There were calls for a speech, but he only responded by lifting his hat. Corbett then jumped into the ring and said:

"There is a colored pugilist of the name of Jackson (a yell, 'you are afraid to meet him') who wants to fight me. Jackson is not here to talk for himself, but his manager is here. I want to say that I will fight him and that I have a check for $10,000 in my hand that I will whip Peter Jackson at any time or place."

At this moment "Parson" Davies cleared the ropes, and amid mingled applause and hisses, from the center of the ring he proclaimed that Jackson had, months ago, posted a forfeit of $2,500 for a fight with Corbett, and that the latter was only required to state the time.

"Put up your money!" shouted Corbett. "You know I have to fight Mitchell in December."

"Our money is up," responded the parson amid an uproar of shouts and hisses.

"I want a forfeit!" roared Corbett.

"Here is another forfeit," shouted the parson, producing a big roll of bills from his trousers pocket and handing it to O'Mallay.

"That is satisfactory," announced the latter, and then the announcement was made amid a torrent of cheering that Corbett and Jackson would meet in November for a fight to a finish.

A Poor Crop.

The July returns to the statistican of the department of agriculture make the average condition of cotton, 82.7 against 85.6 in June, showing a decline of nearly three points. The reports show prevalence of bad weather conditions, cool nights, excessive rains and occasional drought spots. Considerable injury has been caused by lice and other insects.

A Gas Explosion.

The Coraopolis Oil Refining Company's Works at Coraopolis, Pa., together with several tanks of crude and refined oil, were completely destroyed by fire.

Killed His Wife and Himself While Insane.

Frank Bayes, a farmer living about four miles west of Wauseon, Ohio, killed his young wife by cutting her throat. He tried to kill his 4-year-old daughter but she escaped. He then shot himself. Insanity is the supposed cause of the crime.

Ex-Governor Allison of Florida, Dead.

Abraham K. Allison, who was Governor of Florida in the '60s, is dead. He was 83 years of age.

Emperor William to Visit the Fair.

That William III., Germany's young ruler, will accept the invitation of the President of the United States to visit the World's Columbian Exposition, is the declaration of the diplomats in discussing the recall of Imperial Commissioner Adolf Wermuth, through whose energy and executive ability Germany's matchless exhibit at Jackson Park has been made possible. Mr. Wermuth sails for home July 20. His recall is ostensibly occasioned by stress of business in connection with his office of Privy Councillor, but among his associates it is asserted that the commissioner has been called back to the fatherland to escort Emperor William to Chicago. Commissioner Wermuth says that he hopes and confidently expects to return before the close of the exposition, and that fact strengthens the current rumor. The commissioner declined to affirm or deny the rumor of the Emperor's acceptance.

MURDERER MILLER LYNCHED.

After Being Hung His Body is Burned to a Crisp.

Bardwell (Ky.) special: Whether guilty of the awful crime which he was charged or not, Leay J. Miller, the negro arrested at Sykeston, Mo., has paid the penalty for it. He was dragged from the jail by an infuriated mob whose purpose was to burn him at the stake. That he was not burned alive seems to have been due to the very fury of the mob that killed him. Excited into hysterics the ringleaders lost their heads and hanged him with a chain to a telegraph pole, while they were themselves shouting "burn him." John Ray, the father of the murdered girls, with singular inconsistency asked that the negro be not burned, although in the morning he had set the hour for the torture. It is doubtful if he knew what he was doing he was so excited. After being dragged from the jail the negro was hurried away amid cries of "burn him, burn him," until a telegraph pole was reached. A chain was drawn around his neck and two men climbed the pole with the other end of it. The negro was drawn up and strangled. Some one fired a shot into his body before he was dead. Everybody was disappointed and angry at the manner of his death. The body was lowered and horribly mutilated, the ears, fingers, and other parts being cut away. The body was then dragged by the mob a distance of 300 yards across the railroad tracks and burned. The funeral pile is to be kept burning all night. After his arrest the negro was positively identified by the fisherman who ferried him across the river. He also had on his person a ring belonging to one of his victims and his knife contained hair torn from her head. These were identified by her father. He was lodged in jail here at about noon and ate a hearty dinner. He called for a Methodist preacher and one waited on him. He professed conversion and was baptized. Immediately after being baptized he raised his hand and swore he was innocent. This statement he repeated to the mob. The door of the jail was battered a few minutes before 3 o'clock and he was dragged out. Fully 7,000 people, men, women, and children, witnessed the execution.

SERIOUS CASUALTY.

Fifteen Persons Injured at Coney Island.

New York special: An accident occurred on the elevated railway at West Brighton Beach, Coney Island, in which fifteen persons were injured. It happened at 2:45 o'clock and over 500 persons were in the station waiting for the train to carry them to the Brighton Beach race track. As the two cars were pushed into the station by the small engine all were in a great hurry to get aboard, and rushed for the rear car. Suddenly there was a terrible crashing of boards followed by loud shrieks and twenty-five feet of the platform, where the crowd was standing, caved in. The broken boards dropped eight feet, where they were caught by the cross beams and held. Fortunately no space was thrown open or the crowd would have fallen to the rear yard below and been seriously injured. The following are the injured as far as known:

Miss Lane, M. Grossman, A. Schneider, M. Gallagher, Miss Woodward, A. J. Geachs, James Williams.

The injured people suffered bruises, cuts and a few broken bones. The most seriously hurt was A. Schneider. His hip and one or two ribs were broken. One finger was torn off and he sustained numerous cuts, wounds, and bruises on his scalp, face, and body. A few others were injured, although not seriously.

FOR FREE COINAGE.

Montana Silver Men Push for Free Coinage.

The Montana Silver Conference at Helena, Mont., was attended by 300 delegates representing every business interest of Montana. The sentiment was unanimous for coinage, and speeches were made by Senator Power, Congressman Hartman, Marcus Daly, Lee Mantell, and others. The conference resulted in the formation of the Montana Free Coinage Association with Marcus Daly as President and ex-Governor Hauser chairman of the executive committee. The association will take in hand the work of pushing the cause of free coinage in Congress and will appoint delegates to the bi-metallic league meeting and the St. Louis silver convention. Resolutions were adopted declaring for the free coinage of silver and blaming the demonetization act of 1873 for the present business depression and contraction of currency.

The President Sick.

Buzzards Bay (Mass.) special: A call made at Gray Gables reveals the fact that the President is confined to his room. Secretary Lamont says Mr. Cleveland has an attack of rheumatism in his foot and knee, complaint of which he has suffered for many years and which is no doubt aggravated at this time by the hard work and severe strain on his strength, which the President has undergone since the 4th of March. The trouble has been hanging about him for some weeks, but has now so much increased in severity that he will be compelled to take absolute rest in order that he may be at his post of duty at the special meeting of Congress next month.

Fatal Accident at a Coal Mine.

Rosedale (Ind.) special: As mine No. 9, in the Parke County coal range, was in the act of shutting down the other night, and while four young miners were coming up the slope, three empty cars got loose at the top of the triple and ran down with lightning speed. The miners were caught in a narrow place and could not escape. Joseph Craven was instantly killed. Otto Grogan, aged 14, was crushed about the temples and will die. Rolla Grogan, still younger, and Joe Blacketer, aged about 15, were badly bruised about the head and hips.

A Race War to Be Commenced in Missouri.

Dexter, (Mo.) special: News was brought here that great excitement prevails in the vicinity of Sikeston, twenty miles east of here, in Scott County, where the negro, Miller, who murdered the Ray girls near Bardwell, Ky., was captured, and that an effort will be made to run the negroes out of that locality. There will probably be serious trouble as many bold citizens and farmers of that part of Scott and New Madrid counties employ considerable negro labor, and will defend the negroes. The white citizens favor moving them.

Sea Serpent Seen Again.

The sea serpent turned up again at Breakley's Bay, Wolfe Island, five miles from Kingston, Ont. Last summer a woman struck the thing with an oar. This time it frightened F. Leonard, who was rowing across the bay with dinners for workingmen quarrying granite. Leonard says it was many feet long, had a head like a pug dog, and was very agile. It would stretch out its heap and rush through the water, making a hissing noise.

Sons of Veterans.

Terre Haute special: The following is a list of officers for Indiana division, Sons of Veterans, for the ensuing year: Commander, Newton J. McGuire, Rising Sun; Senior Vice Commander, George P. C. Newman, Hammond; Junior Vice Commander, George W. Kreitenstein, Terre Haute; Division Council, E.H. Bookwalter, Fort Wayne, Fremont Garrett and A. J. Bosworth of Winchester.

Ladies' Aid Society officers: Miss Georgia Duncan, Laketon, President; Division Council, Pearl Wills, Clayton; Gertrude Gilpine, Portland; Vonnie Muller, Bloomington. Delegate, Adda Wallace, Indianapolis; Chief of Staff, Miss Sybil Neidhammer, of Fort Wayne.

A Stricken Town.

Affairs at Ironwood, Mich., where typhoid fever plague prevails, grow worse. None of the infected city water is used, but new cases still appear. Wells have been ordered closed and pure water has been imported from Ashland and Milwaukee. The hospital and the armory are full of typhoid fever patients, and school buildings will have to be used for the same purpose. Three thousand miners are idle and the city and county funds are exhausted. Five hundred people are now living on public or private bounty.

Derrick Men Fall.

Portland (Ind.) special: John Hitchcock of Lima, fell from the top of a derick sixty feet high in the Camden field and was instantly killed. He was pulling casing and the structure gave away. George McFarling fell from a derrick on the Walton farm about the same time and had both arms and his leg broken. He also sustained bad internal injuries.

Society of the Army of the Tennessee.

Gen. Hickenlooper has just issued the official call for a meeting of the society of the Army of the Tennessee at Chicago the 12th and 13th of September. The local executive committee, charged with the preparations for the meeting, will make ample provision for the reception and entertainment of members.

Judge Blatchford Dead.

Associate Justice Samuel Blatchford died at Newport, R. I. He retained consciousness up to the hour before his death. Arrangements for the funeral are not complete, but the body will probably be taken to Washington for interment. Judge Blatchford was appointed to the Supreme Bench in 1882.

Another Lynching Party.

Peoria (Ill.) special: Miss Smith, 16 years old, on her way to East Peoria was grabbed by two negroes who bound, gagged, and assaulted her. The cords which bound her were set on fire, terribly burning her arms and wrists. One of the miscreants has been captured, and lynching is looked for.

Bank President Gets Five Years.

C. W. Mosher, President of the defunct Capital National Bank of Lincoln, Neb., was sentenced to five years in the Sioux Falls penitentiary by Judge Dundy of the United States District Court. It is estimated that Mosher embezzled over $2,200,000.

One Reason for Striking.

Forty switchmen in the Cleveland yards of the Lake Shore Railroad struck because the yard conductor, who allowed two of his brakemen to become intoxicated on duty, was suspended for fifteen days. The men already think their action hasty.

Fifty Persons Drowned.

St. Petersburg special: Full particulars of the burning of the steamer Alfons near Romanoff, July 4, have been received. The passengers became panic-stricken and dozens jumped overboard. Nearly fifty persons were drowned.

Gave Him a Respite.

Governor McKinley has granted Frank Vanloon, the Columbus Grove robber and murderer of Farmer Vandermark, a respite to August 4, in order to give the condemned man's friends a chance to present new evidence.

Rumor of Revolution.

San Francisco special: It is rumored that a revolution has broken out in Australia, and that independence has been declared, but little credence however is given the rumor.

It will Soon be Saint Columbus.

During the reception of the Columbian minister, at Rome, the pope said that America would soon have a patron saint, as Columbus would be beatified shortly.

Cotton Crop Short.

Advices from 300 cotton growing points indicate that the crop will be very short. Unfavorable weather and insects are responsible for the shortage.

An Indiana Town Destroyed.

The entire business portion of Russiaville, Ind., was destroyed by fire. Loss, $40,000; insurance, $15,000.

WIND'S AWFUL WORK.

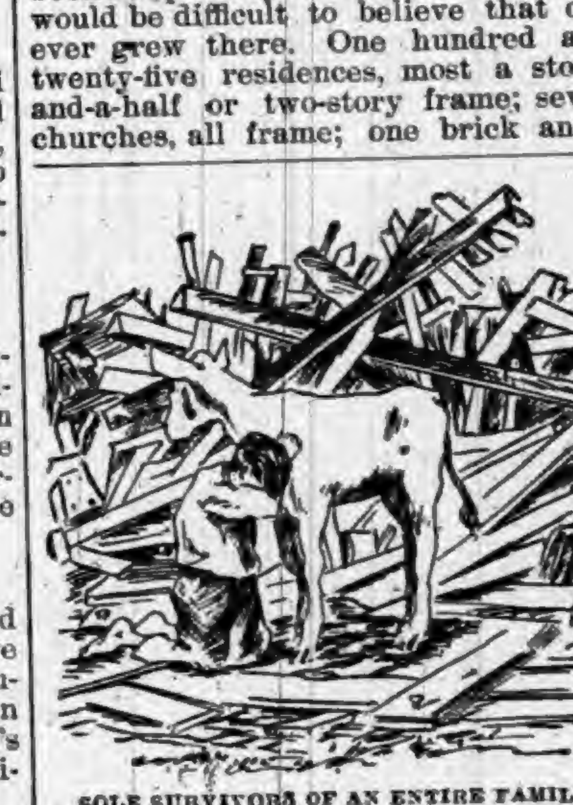
OVER SEVENTY DEAD FROM IOWA'S STORM.

Utter Desolation in the Devastated District—Homes Demolished and Crops Ruined—Gov. Boies Appeals for Aid—Death List Not Yet Complete.

Ruin in Its Wake.

More complete details from the cyclone-swept section of Northwestern Iowa do not diminish its horrors. The latest reports give the number of dead at seventy-four, and it is said at least five more will die, while the injured number considerably over one hundred. A conservative estimate places the whole number that were either killed or injured by the tornado at 250. At Pomeroy alone over fifty are dead. Five blocks of residences were completely swept away, not more than kindling wood being left of them.

The disaster is the most dire one that has occurred in Iowa since the Grinnell cyclone. The loss of life at Pomeroy is not so great as at Grinnell, but the destruction of property will be more complete. At 6 o'clock Thursday evening a thousand happy people sat down to their tea-tables chatting cheerily, unconscious of impending danger. Friday morning more than half of them were wandering about homeless and half crazed, depending on charity for food and drink, while strangers were winding the grave-clothes around their dead. Every house left standing was a hospital. Every citizen of Pomeroy mourns the loss of a relative or friend. Two hundred families are homeless, many having lost all they owned. Hundreds of people poured in on every train to view the ruins, and to every one of them the completeness of the havoc wrought by the tornado was painfully apparent. Sixty-five acres of debris is what is left of Pomeroy now. Imagine a gigantic pile of lumber scattered in every direction over a broad prairie and you have a good picture of this wrecked Iowa city. Nothing but the occasional shattered remains of a wall or the half-destroyed gable of a dwelling rise above the level of the ground. The numerous trees that surrounded the town have been swept away so completely that it would be difficult to believe that one ever grew there. One hundred and twenty-five residences, most a story-and-a-half or two-story frame; seven churches, all frame; one brick and a half-dozen frame business buildings constitute the total of buildings that were wrecked. Of course, the loss on these is total. All the other business houses, probably fifty, were more or less damaged. Those who are competent to judge say the loss in the city will not be less than a quarter of a million.



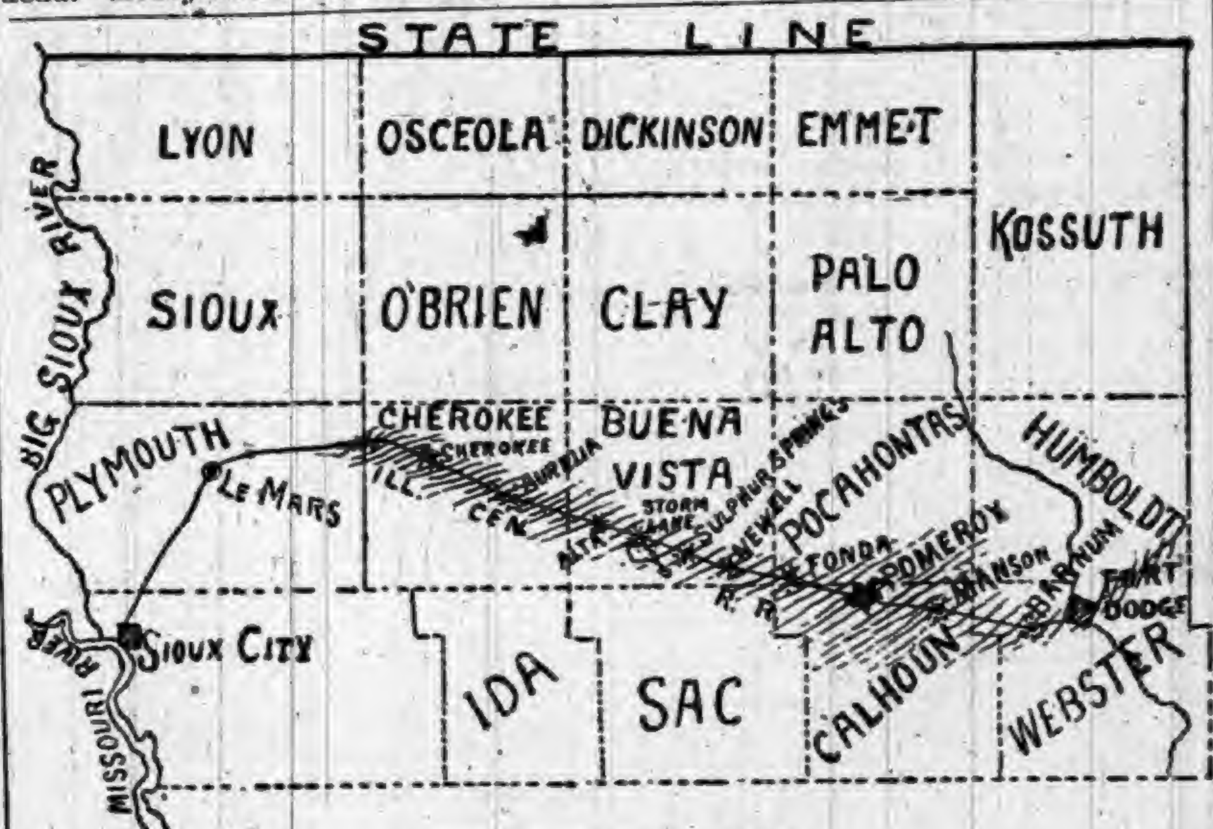
SOLE SURVIVORS OF AN ENTIRE FAMILY.

All in a Minute.

The storm did its terrible work in one minute's time. Just before dark great banks of black clouds massed in the southwest and another in the west. About 7 o'clock the two threatening piles moved toward one another and then joined. The clouds took on a green tint, which was pierced with the sun's rays for a moment. Then darkness set in rapidly. The elements seemed to form about the combined clouds, though scarcely a breeze stirred the tree-tops in the streets of Pomeroy. Those who were watching the phenomena say that a column of smoke like a cloud dropped to the ground and gathered in strength as it advanced toward the town. They recognized it as a cyclone and gave the alarm. Many sought shelter in cellars and others mounted horses to flee from the path of the coming destruction. There was a dash of hail, a blinding flash of lightning and deafening peal of thunder. Men and women ran wildly about the streets shouting and gesticulating. The cyclone struck the town at the southwest among the scattering houses in the outskirts. Roofs and shingles and sides of buildings were wrenched loose and were thrown to one side. On to the more densely populated district the monster of destruction swept, leveling all before it and leaving in its wake a cloud of splinters and wrecked homes, death and demoralization. The people were panic stricken and fled here and there amid the flying timbers until stricken down to the earth, mangled, torn, and dead. While the tornado lasted it was pitch dark, except for the vivid flashes of lightning which lit the weird and awful scene. The rain came down in torrents, the roar of the thunder and the storm was deafening. The air was full of sticks, stones, mud, horses, cattle, pigs, chickens, houses, machinery, bricks, human beings, and everything that was unable to resist the force of the terrible tempest. It was all over in a few seconds. Oh, what a piteous spectacle greeted the eyes of the agonized survivors! Dead people were on every side. Husband and wife lay on the ground, their glassy eyes turned heavenward and the bodies rent and torn in the most cruel manner. Mothers and their little babies were found stark dead, with their brains oozing out of their crushed skulls and their life blood soaking the sod beneath them. Rescuing parties at once set out, and the dead and wounded were brought in as fast as men could work. The telegraph and telephone lines were blown down, and Ed Masterson set out on a horse to Manson for help. He succeeded in flagging Vice President Harahan's special train, which flew back to Manson, and help from all the towns along the line was soon on hand. Fifteen surgeons were soon caring for the wounded. The Good Templars' Hall was turned into a hospital, and the old postoffice building did duty as a morgue. The shrieks of the wounded and the groans of the dying were mingled with the agonizing moans of those so suddenly bereft of their dear ones. It was a sight that beggars description.

Sweep of the Storm.

As shown by the accompanying map, the tornado started a short distance west of Cherokee and followed closely the Illinois Central Railroad, cutting a swath from one-quarter to one-half mile wide and completely demolishing everything in its path for a distance of sixty miles. All along this strip, in addition to the devastation wrought at Pomeroy, Fonda, Storm Lake, and other towns in its path, are wrecked homes and ruined farms. The actual loss of life in the path of the storm through the country cannot yet be accurately stated, but it is known to be great, and the damage to property is tremendous. Thousands of acres of corn alone have been destroyed. In many huge fields of corn nothing is left but the roots, and in some instances they have been torn out. It is difficult to estimate the loss, but it will reach far up in the thousands. Not a barn, or a house, or shed, or fence, or tree in the path of the storm stands. A swath was mowed through the biggest part of the woods. Huge trees were torn out by their roots and others equally as large were broken off at the place where their circumference was largest. Ten farmhouses and all their barns and outhouses between Pomeroy and Fonda have been wrecked. Only splinters of the largest buildings remain.



COURSE OF THE STORM.

GOV. BOIES APPEALS FOR HELP.

He Issues a Proclamation Describing the Scope of the Disaster.

Gov. Boies was telegraphed as to the scope of the disaster and appealed to for aid. Whereupon the Governor immediately took the train for Pomeroy. On arriving there and looking over the desolate waste, he issued the following proclamation:

> To the People of Iowa:
>
> From a personal examination of the ruin wrought by the storm of last evening I find that forty-two are already dead and upward of 100 are seriously injured in this town, which had a population of 1,000 souls. The great bulk of the residence portion of the town is completely destroyed and hundreds of families are homeless and destitute. In at least one town west of here eight or ten are said to have been killed and many injured. The necessity for aid is imperative. The good people in towns adjacent to Pomeroy have supplied immediate wants for board and clothing, but it is impossible for them to supply all that will be needed in the future. Money, however, is the great necessity of the hour. We must not only help these people to live, but we must aid them to rebuild their destroyed homes. Permit me to recommend that in every city and town of the State immediate steps be instituted by the Mayors and municipal officers to organize relief committees and promptly proceed to collect and forward aid. This may be directed to the "Relief Committee of Pomeroy, Iowa," which will be organized during the day, and will consist of thoroughly responsible persons of this and other towns; so that aid will be fairly and equitably distributed to all who are in want. Citizens of Iowa, it is no exageration for me to say that no more deserving appeal was ever made to you for aid. Be sure that you are both prompt and liberal.
>
> HORACE BOIES,
> Governor of Iowa.

Gov. Boies' appeal met with quick response from all parts of the State, and in a short while over $2,000 had been received by telegraph and mail. The Illinois Central sent relief trains from Fort Dodge, Manson, and Cherokee, with physicians and citizens to assist in taking care of the people, and they did noble work. Undertakers and coffins were also sent from various points. Carloads of provisions have since been arriving by every train, and enough clothing to supply all the survivors is stacked up in the building used as the headquarters of the committee. What is needed now is money. The victims have plenty to eat and wear, but they are in most cases penniless. What little they had was their homes and what there was in them, but these have been blown away. Money to rebuild them is what the relief committee is calling now, and their needs are likely to be promptly met. Abundant evidence of this was received in a telegram from the Mayor of Sioux City saying $1,000 had been raised there. Another from Des Moines announced that a like amount had been contributed at the capital. Emmetsburg sent $100, and many towns are coming to the front in good shape.

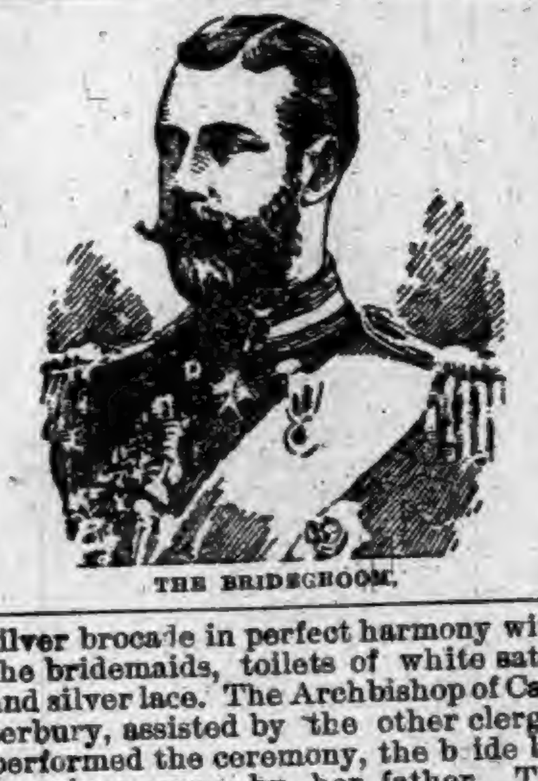
ROYAL LOVERS WED.

PRINCESS MAY AND THE DUKE OF YORK UNITED.

Rejoicing Throughout All England—An Heir of the Prince of Wales Never Before Married During His Father's Lifetime—Archbishop of Canterbury Officiates.

Prince George's Day.

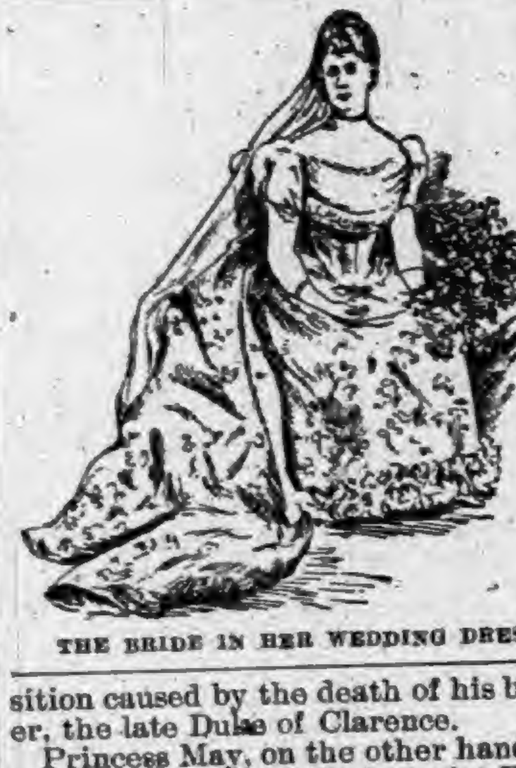
The marriage of the Duke of York (Prince George of Wales) and Princess Victoria May of Teck, an event to which all England had been looking forward with deep interest, took place at 12:30 o'clock Thursday in the Chapel Royal, St. James palace. The wedding was a brilliant function and was attended by a large gathering of the members of the British royal family, continental sovereigns or their representatives and many more members of the highest nobility. The marriage ceremony opened with the procession of the clergy into the chapel. The bride wore the veil which was worn by her mother on the occasion of her own marriage. Her wedding gown was of silver brocade in perfect harmony with the bridemaids, toilets of white satin and silver lace. The Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the other clergy, performed the ceremony, the bride being given away by her father. The dejeuner was served at Buckingham palace. After receiving congratulations the Duke and Duchess of York left the palace, driving through the Mall to the city, and thence proceeded by the Great Eastern Railway from Pool street to Sandringham. The wedded pair were the recipients of many gifts of fabulous value.



THE BRIDEGROOM.

The royal couple occupy a unique position, inasmuch as it is the first time in the history of England that the son and heir of the Prince of Wales has married while his father bore that title. For three generations in the direct line of succession to be alive, and the youngest of these of marriageable age, is sufficiently rare, and the actual celebration of the marriage under such circumstances is unprecedented.

Prince George is twenty-eight years of age, about three years the senior of his bride. Both have been most carefully educated, and have lived up to a few years ago as simple as the children of country gentry. At a very tender age Prince George displayed a strong inclination for a seafaring life, and at the age of twelve passed the naval examination and entered the training ship at Dartmouth. From that time he has been almost continually at sea, and has acquired a practical knowledge of the service. He did not finally leave the service until the change in his position caused by the death of his brother, the late Duke of Clarence.



THE BRIDE IN HER WEDDING DRESS.

Princess May, on the other hand, has spent her whole life in quiet White Lodge at Richmond. Until two years ago, when she visited the Queen at Balmoral, she had never been away from home alone. She had seen but little more of the world than a clergyman's daughter, and her days had been filled with domestic duties, visiting the sick and poor of the neighborhood and in the company of her three younger brothers, who are said to adore her. Her mother, the portly Duchess of Teck, however, has been an excellent manager, and the British public has long been cognizant of the sweetness of character of their own and only English princess. Almost from the time she has been grown up her English birth and training have been dwelt upon, her charity to the poor, her simple tastes and kind heart until she has become the popular idol. It would seem that good-natured, shrewd Princess Mary of Teck has had her daughter in training for the future Queen of England from her birth. It is nearly two years since the preparations for the marriage of the Princess to the Duke of Clarence were sadly interrupted by the sudden calamity of his death.

THE TALE OF A HAT;

Or, Josh Merritt's Mania—Written for This Paper.

BY JULES VERNE.

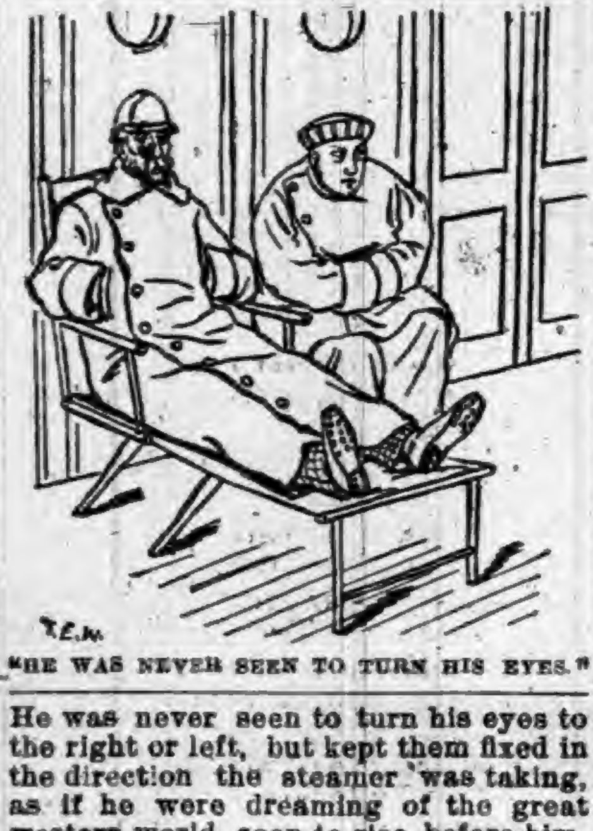
CHAPTER I.

Early in September, 1884, a group of homeward-bound Americans stood on the deck of one of the White Star steamers waving a last adieu to English shores. To judge from the easy-going familiarity which they displayed in entering into conversation with each other and in exchanging opinions as to the probable length of the voyage home, one might have supposed that they were all old friends; but far from it. Up to that time they had been the completest strangers in the world, with one exception, however, for two of the group were mother and son, Mrs. Hetty Waldron and her only child, Captain Harry Waldron, U. S. A. Although still in the twenties this young West-Pointer had won a pair of captain's shoulder straps for a signal bravery in a desperate struggle with the Apaches, the Indians being ten to his one. Captain Harry, however, had been severely wounded and was now returning home from a six months' leave, quite himself again. A glance at the lady beside him would have satisfied any one as to the source of the Captain's magnificent figure. Mrs. Waldron was a singularly handsome woman, only a shade the other side of 40, tall, graceful, and distinguished-looking, she, too, seemed born to command. In fact, she had passed her whole life among military men, and had taken on the very color and character of her habitat. Following her husband—likewise an army officer—about from post to post on the plains, she had learned, like him, to face danger without flinching, and not only to draw a revolver and lift a rifle, but to use either of them when occasion required, and, as far as horsemanship went, she thought no more of a fifty-mile gallop over a rough country, through canyons and over fords, than a city woman does of a three-mile canter in the park.

"I don't think he's an American," said Captain Harry as his mother pointed out an eccentric-looking man, who, wrapped in his rug, was reclining in a steamer chair near the group, but who, it was quite evident, was not paying the slightest heed to the animated conversation.

"And yet he has a Chinese servant," observed Mrs. Waldron, as she drew her son's attention that individual, a man of about 35, yellow as a lemon and shaped like one of the squatty vases of his country. He looked quite fat enough to be a three-buttoned mandarin as he sat there on the bench with a painfully sleepy expression on his face.

Unless all signs failed, the stolid gentleman wrapped in the steamer rug was a son of Albion, British to the tips of his nails, tall, thin, bony to a degree almost fitting him to be a model for a class in osteology. According as you looked at him, he was either all neck, all body, or all legs. This specimen of the Anglo-Saxon race was possibly somewhat past 50, and stood six feet several inches above the level of the sea. A full beard of an indescribable yellow, a head of hair of the same hue, a pair of small, deep set, lynx-like eyes, a nose with little or no swell at the nostrils, of great length, and curved like a hawk's beak, and a cranium upon which any one with the merest scattering of phrenology might have detected the bumps of unqualified monomania and extreme pertinacity—such were, crudely outlined, the head and front of the man in the steamer chair, a personality which would have delighted the soul of any genial caricaturist. The man's attire was line for line of the international English cut and style—a double-visor cap, a waistcoat buttoned up to his chin, a jacket with twenty pockets, trousers of the checkerboard pattern, high gaiters with nickel buttons, the soles of his shoes studded with nails, and a gray-white duster which he kept wound tightly around his body as if desirous of accentuating his bony build. Who was this eccentric-looking individual? No one knew. One thing was certain, however—he had never been seen on board the Germanic before that day. The steward, who is supposed to know everything, could only say that he was an Englishman booked for New York, that his name was Joshua Merritt, which he signed Josh Merritt, that he hailed from Liverpool, and that he was accompanied by his body servant, Gin-Ghi, of Hong Kong, a subject of the Emperor of the Celestial Empire. The moment the steamer had got under headway Merritt had ordered Gin-Ghi to arrange his chair on the sunny side of the vessel and had not budged till 4, when the lunch bell rang. Back he came at 4:30, disappearing again at 7 to go to dinner, and returning to his post after an hour's absence. His attitudes and movements were strikingly like those of a manikin.



"HE WAS NEVER SEEN TO TURN HIS EYES."

He was never seen to turn his eyes to the right or left, but kept them fixed in the direction the steamer was taking, as if he were dreaming of the great western world soon to rise before him. At 10 o'clock to the minute he arose and betook himself to his state-room, with a gait so balanced and even that the roll of the vessel was powerless to affect it.

The next morning Josh Merritt was back in his place again in exactly the same attitude, the same pose, even the skirts of his duster twisted into the same wrinkles as on the day before, while Gin-Ghi was seated near him with the same pained expression of ennui and tedium on his smooth, round yellow face.

For Captain Harry the card-room had no charms, and as he looked about him for someone to chat with, his eyes fell upon Mr. Joshua Merritt of Liverpool stretched to his full length in his steamer chair. Judge of the young officer's surprise as he halted alongside the gentleman from Liverpool to hear the latter pipe out in a shrill tone, "Captain Harry Waldron, of the United States army, I believe?"

"The same, at your service, sir," stammered Waldron.

"The son of the late Colonel Hastings Waldron, U. S. A.," squeaked Merritt.

"Yes, sir," gasped Harry; I see that you are acquainted——"

"Oh, yes—your father—great Indjan fighter—with Custer on the Little Big Horn—Custer ought to have taken his advice—yes, that's so—your mother is a wonderful woman—yes, that's so. I've had a loss, too——" and here this bit of human machinery seemed to suddenly run down.

"Daughter or wife?" timidly suggested Capt. Harry, hoping to start it up again.

"Oh, no—never married—that's so—if I had lost my wife I wouldn't be looking for her—that's so——"

"Then you are searching for——"

"A hat!"

"A hat?" queried Waldron with a puzzled air. "You have lost your hat?"

"My hat?" squeaked Merritt. "Oh, no; not mine yet; yes, that's so—present my compliments to your mother—wonderful woman—yes, that's so," and again the human clock ran down completely, and Josh Merritt's lips were pressed together so tight that the young captain took the hint and walked away.

"Is he a lunatic or is he shamming?" muttered Harry to himself, as he looked about in search of his mother, to whom he made known the astonishing fact that this eccentric tourist was well acquainted with their family.

The Germanic was well on her way across the Atlantic before the truth leaked out that the eccentric Englishman in the gray-white duster was no less a personage than Mr. Joshua Merritt, the retired Liverpool lock manufacturer, worth a cool £1,000,000 sterling. At once there was a flutter among the women, young and old, and the human talking machine was kept busy squeaking out in excruciating monotony the sole phrase which it seemed capable of uttering—"That's so; yes, that's so; that's so; yes, that's so."

Mrs. Waldron had not abandoned all idea of taking a second husband, only he must be rich, very rich, so that Harry might resign from the army and they be enabled to settle down in gay and frivolous New York, the Paris of the new world. Mr. Merritt filled the bill exactly. What harm did his eccentricity do? As for his checker-board trousers, high gaiters, etc., once hers she would soon make another man of him.

But although it was only too evident that the heart of the machine man felt the warmth of this radiant soul, yet he stood firm, or rather sat firm in his steamer chair. Once he so far forgot himself as to invite the "wonderful woman" to sit down beside him. Gin-Ghi was asleep. The moon was full. The supreme moment seemed to have arrived. After an almost endless string of "Yes, that's so's," Mrs. Waldron succeeded in dragging in the remark that nothing was more beautiful than a moonlight night at sea. "Yes, that's so! Yes, that's so!" squeaked Mr. Merritt, "but I would like it better," he added after a pause, "if the man in the moon only wore a hat—yes, that's so, that's so!" he repeated slowly over and over, and then the clock-work came to a dead standstill. The man of $5,000,000 and Gin-Ghi, his factotum, were both sound asleep.

CHAPTER II.

No one drew a muscle as Mr. Joshua Merritt, closely followed by Gin-Ghi, loaded like a packmule with valises, hat boxes, canes and umbrellas, strode into the corridor of the Brevoort House, and approaching the desk, set down in a bold, staff hand the words: "Josh Merritt and man servant, Liverpool." People are accustomed to curious types in a cosmopolitan city like New York, and to eccentric Englishmen in particular at the Brevoort. The rich manufacturer had softened a little bit in taking leave of Mrs. Waldron on the wharf and had actually invited mother and son to visit him in England the next year. Mrs. Waldron was delighted.

And now comes the question: What was this strange pair—one hailing from the extremity of Asia and the other from the extremity of Europe—doing in New York? Where were they bound? How did it happen that they should be racing around the world together, the one footing the bills, the other doing the work? If we listen to their conversation, possibly it may all come out. But, first and foremost, a brief word concerning the Celestial in the service of the Anglo-Saxon. This son of the Orient had not laid aside his national garb. He still wore the chemise (tethan chaol), the tunic (ma coual), the robe (haol) buttoned on the side, and the loose trousers with cloth belt. His name was Gin-Ghi, and he deserved it, for it signified "lazy man," and such he was, if there ever was one. Neither work nor danger seemed to quicken his pace. If ten steps were required to execute a commission, it went undone; if twenty were necessary to escape danger, he took his chances. The wonder is that Merritt's stock of patience did not finally become exhausted. But the truth is, the Englishman had become accustomed to Gin-Ghi's peculiarities, and he now liked him for his defects.

When his orders were not executed he executed them himself. This simplified matters. It was quite possible that the day was not far distant when he would act as Gin-Ghi's body servant. No doubt the Chinaman was inclined to think so, and to his mind it would only be a fair turn about. In the meantime, while waiting for this piece of good luck, Gin-Ghi was obliged to follow his master wherever the sweet will of that eccentric personage dictated. On this point Josh Merritt brooked no remonstrance. He would not hesitated to carry the Chinaman's trunk on his shoulders rather than leave Gin-Ghi behind when a train or steamer was about to start. So willy-nilly, the "lazy man" was forced to lock step with the Englishman and even up things by sleeping all he could during the journey. In this way the pair had accompanied each other for thousands of miles in the old and new worlds, and, as a result of this continuous locomotion, they now found themselves in the great metropolis of the Western hemisphere.

"Yes, that's so, that's so," grumbled Merritt in his beard; "I suppose that you have everything ready?"

It is hard to say why he put this question to Gin-Ghi, since he himself had done all the work with his own hands; but he never failed to ask the question on principle.

"Ready ten thousand times over," replied the Chinaman, who had not been able to rid himself of the style of phraseology current among the children of the Flowery Kingdom.

"Our valises?"

"Are locked and strapped."

"Our firearms?"

"Are in most excellent condition, O, man of all perfections."

"And our supply of provisions?"

"It was you, O, Master Josh, who took the receipts for the same from the express agent. But I don't see why this laying in a supply of provisions is necessary, since if we continue this globe-trotting it is a mere question of time when we shall be eaten up ourselves."

"Eaten up, Gin-Ghi? O, yes, that's so, that's so. Then you expect to be eaten up, do you?"

"Yes, sooner or later, Master Josh. Six months ago we came very near ending our existence in the stomach of a cannibal. I especially."

"You, Gin-Ghi, my faithful servitor?"

"Yes, for the good reason that I'm fat, while you, oh man of all perfections, are very lean, so these people would not hesitate to pick me out."

"Pick you out? Oh, yes, that's so, that's so."

"And, moreover," continued Gin-Ghi, "I'm informed that cannibals are particularly fond of a yellow Chinaman, whose flesh, on account of his feeding upon rice and vegetables, has a very delicate flavor."

"Yes, that's so, that's so," replied Merritt dryly, "and for that reason I have always counseled you to smoke a great deal, for you know the anthropophagi don't like the flesh of a smoker."

"But, thank heaven!" murmured Gin-Ghi, rolling up his little eyes as well as their oblique position would permit, "the North American Indian is not a man-eater!"

"Yes, that's so, that's so," put in Josh Merritt with an almost imperceptible chuckle, "but they are adepts in scalping, and nothing affords them more pleasure than to find a nice long scalp lock already braided for them."

"Ay ya! Ay ya!" broke out Gin-Ghi, reaching up and clasping his hands over his precious queue. "And all this peril, for a single hat, when the world is full of hats! O, when I think of this the tears trickle upon my yellow cheeks like raindrops upon golden chrysanthemums."

"And when shall you get through this trickling?" demanded Joshua, knitting his eyebrows sternly.

"But this hat you are searching for, Master Josh, when you find it, it will be in shreds and tatters."

"Yes, that's so, that's so; but I've heard enough, Gin-Ghi—more than enough. I forbid you to talk about this hat or any other. If you disobey me I'll have you bastinadoed, fifty blows of a rattan on the soles of your feet."

"We are not in China, Master Josh."

"I'll take away your rations."

"Good; that'll reduce my flesh."

"I'll have your queue cut off close to your head."

"Cut off my queue?" gasped Gin-Ghi.

"I'll stop your allowance of tobacco!"

"The god Fo will not refuse me protection."

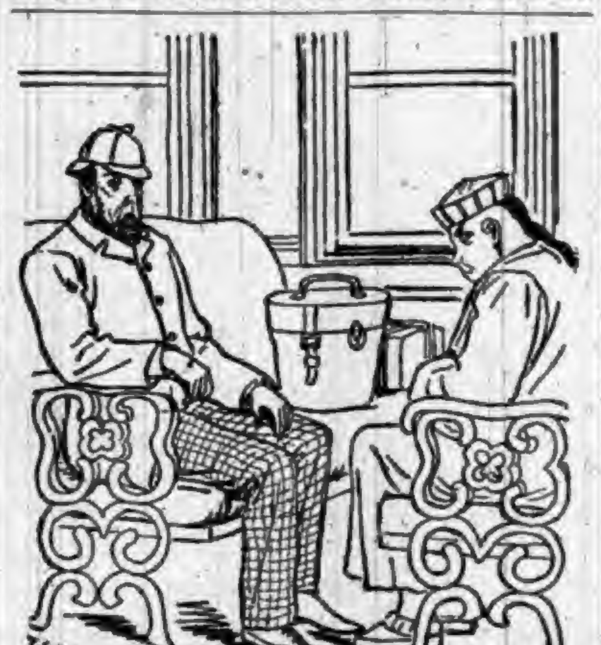
"It won't do you a bit of good. Yes, that's so!"

But this last threat of Merritt's was not without its effect. Gin-Ghi's manner suddenly changed, and, courtesying most obsequiously, he professed the utmost respect for the man of all perfections.

CHAPTER III.

But what hat was this thus mysteriously referred to, and why was Joshua Merritt passing his whole life hunting after a hat? This man of many eccentricities, as has been said, was an Englishman from Liverpool, one of those harmless monomaniacs who are not met with solely in the United Kingdom, for who has not fallen in with them on the banks of the Loire, the Elbe, the Danube, and the Scheide, as well as in the region washed by the Thames, the Clyde, or the Tweed? His eccentric tastes as a collector had made the wealthy Joshua Merritt a well-known man in Lancaster and adjoining counties. He was not one of those ordinary collectors whose souls are satisfied with engravings, books, objects of art or antiquity which they spend life and fortune hunting for. Oh, no; his grand passion was hats—a great museum of historical headgear.

Joshua Merritt had already laid most of the globe under requisition in his search after valuable additions to his collection of hats, and now that he had, for the time being at least, by personal efforts or by means of agents and correspondents, exhausted the stocks of Europe, Asia and Africa, and, to a degree, those of the two Americas and Oceanica, the thought had come to him of pushing his searches into the far West of the United States territory. He had a special reason for so doing—a reason that would not have seemed very weighty to any one else, but which to him was very important. His studies of the aborigines had made known to him the fact that the North American Indian had a great love, nay, almost a passion, for the discarded silk hats of their civilized brethren, no matter in what state of dilapidation they might be; that very year a crop of these silk hats was harvested in the East and shipped to this Western market. Therefore was it that Mr. Merritt felt quite sure of striking something rare and valuable on this trip. But, independent of this general notion, the great collector had something special in view. To tell the truth, he was oppressed by a fixed notion, a day nightmare, which threatened to make complete his partial insanity. Some way or other, only known to himself, he had come upon the trace of a certain hat, which would add great fame to his collection. What it was, who had made it, and whether it had decked the head of prince, burgher, or peasant, Joshua had thus far kept to himself. Suffice it to say that after a long and tedious hunt, during which he had followed up a dozen trails only to be thrown off the scent in the end, he had struck the right one and run his game to cover. To speak plainly, he was now convinced that this hat decked the head of some Indian chief in the far West, and he was determined to buy it at whatever price the red man might set upon it, or to steal it if the chief refused to sell.



"THE STRANGELY ASSORTED PAIR WAS SOON MOVING WESTWARD."

Although Gin-Ghi took good care not to quicken his movements in the least—for why should he when his master's hands were so much bigger and stronger than his?—yet everything was in readiness at the appointed hour, and the strangely assorted pair was soon moving westward at the rate of almost a mile a minute. Gin-Ghi awoke after they had been under way for six hours, but a glance at his face warned him that it would be dangerous to rouse Master Josh from his fit of deep thought, so he dropped off to sleep again.

But the time has come when the reader can be no longer trifled with. He is entitled to know something about this mysterious silk hat, which with its limp and flapping brim beckoned Joshua Merritt on and ever onward toward the setting sun. This hat once rested upon an imperial brow, for it was once the property of Napoleon III., Emperor of the French. Why, exclaims the astonished reader, that would not be such a wonderful addition to the Merritt museum, for surely during the nineteen years of the Emperor's reign it would not have been a very difficult matter to obtain a silk hat once worn by him. Paris must be full of them. One moment, impatient reader, this was a particular silk hat worn by Napoleon III. while he was still merely Prince Louis. It sheltered his head the morning of his unfortunate attempt to seize the Empire of Strasburg. He had it on his head when he escaped to America. He wore it during his brief sojourn in New York City, when he had lodgings in East Houston street and upon the eve of his return to Europe at the call of his dying mother, Queen Hortense, he gave it to his friend Mr. Smith. Is there any wonder that Joshua Merritt yearned to possess this historical silk hat given by a prince, soon to become an emperor, to Mr. Smith? But what Mr. Smith? Who was Mr. Smith? What did Mr. Smith do with the hat?

To all these questions no satisfactory answers can be given. The reader, if he be an intelligent man, must surely know that money, patience and perseverance make up a strong team. Josh Merritt had all three. For twenty years he had had his mental eye on this hat. Was he about to be rewarded for these years of sleepless vigilance, of untiring endeavor?

A PLACE OF HARMONY.

The Mahometan's Idea of What Paradise Is Like.

The followers of Mahomet believe that they enter paradise by way of a bridge which connects earth with heaven, and that the first taste of never-ending joys is a cooling draught from "Mahomet's Pond." This pond is an oddity in itself, even though it were not located just inside of the gates of paradise. It is a month's journey in circumference and its waters are as white as milk. As many cups are set around it as there are stars in the firmament, and he that drinks once never thirsts again. Beyond this lake is the Garden of Paradise, an ecstatic dream of pleasure, filled with sparkling streams and fountains of honey, shady groves, diamonds and rubies of monstrous size, flowers and fruits of every known kind, blooming youths of both sexes, circulating goblets of nectar and carrying censers of burning incense—in short, a region of delightsome music and unbroken peace.

In this place Ali has twelve palaces of gold and silver brick laid in mortar mixed with honey and musk, and in each of these is a throne. Then come the bowers of pearls and smaller heavenly structures, each with its throne of emeralds, rubies or gold. Upon each throne sits an houri arrayed in seventy robes of green and seventy of yellow. She herself is transparent and so are the robes, all being of so fine a texture that the marrow in her ankles may be seen as distinctly as though it were a flame in a yellow glass tube. Each of these innumerable houris has seventy locks of hair, each lock under the care of a maid, who perfumes it from a censer which God has made to smoke with incense without the presence of fire.

Living Net.

At Tetuila, one of the islands of Oceanica, M. Aylic Marin witnessed a peculiar method of fishing. The scene, as he describes it, is picturesque and interesting. The costume of the natives of Tetuila is a kind of short tunic of sea-weed or leaves. They powder the hair white with chalk, and wear wreaths of gardenias or red hibiscus on their heads and around their necks. The warriors, unlike the men of peace, powder their hair red. As their locks are very long, they have quite a terrible appearance.

At a signal all the inhabitants of the village assembled on the seashore. There were about two hundred persons. They plunged into the water, each carrying a branch of the cocoa palm.

At a given distance from the shore they turned toward it, and formed a compact half circle, each one holding his palm branch perpendicularly in the water, thus forming a kind of seine. The leader of the party gave a signal, and this living net approached the shore gradually, in perfect order, driving before it a multitude of fishes. Surrounded by this living wall, and caught in the cocoa palm branches, many of the fishes were cast on the sand by the waves and others were killed with sticks.

The women gathered up the fishes in baskets. Some were at once taken to the cabin of the chief of the village, and some were cooked for M. Marin over hot coals, and given to him without seasoning, but with bananas and cocoanut milk to complete the meal.

Oh! the Horrid Man!

They had been married about a year and were passing through their first experience in house-cleaning. He was trying to drive a picture-nail with a tack-hammer. He might as well have tried to drive a yoke of steers with a straw. Naturally, his otherwise delightful disposition was ruffled, and of course his wife was to blame. But he would not quarrel with her. He was not that kind of a man.

"Mary," said he, looking down at her from the top of the step-ladder, and making an effort to appear calm, "will you bring me one of those biscuits you made for breakfast this morning?"

"Why, Horace," she responded, looking up at him wonderingly, "whatever do you want with it?"

"I want to drive this confounded nail with it," he said. "This hammer is too light to do any good at all."

ONE of the most wonderful discoveries in science recently, says the American Machinist, is the fact that a beam of light produces sound. A sunlight beam is thrown through a lens on a glass vessel that contains lamp-black, colored silk, worsted or other substances. A disk having slits or openings cut in it is made to revolve swiftly in this beam of light so as to cut it up, thus making alternate flashes of light and shadow. On putting the ear to the glass vessel strange sounds are heard so long as the flashing beam is falling on the vessel.

He Preferred Painting.

The Steuben Republican of last week had some additional history of J. H. Stiefel, now J. H. Caliga, whose marriage we noticed last week. Our older citizens will be interested to know how Mr. Stiefel changed his profession from drygoods and clothing to become an artist. The extract says:

"Early in his teens he came to Boston and went to work as clerk in a store. His name then was Stiefel. He did not like business very much, and he had the artistic instinct strong. He liked making copies of the pretty pictorial labels on goods better than he did studying cost marks and blarneying customers. His first attempt that he ventured to show to anyone was a bunch of grapes. This maiden effort showed to the eye of Mr. Waterman so much promise that he encouraged the boy to go on. * * * This was when the change in his name came about. "Stiefel," his German patronimic, means boot, and he discarded it for the Latin word for boot, "Caliga." He went to Munich and studied there for six years, returning with a number of pictures which he put on exhibition in Boston and New York. They attracted great attention in both cities, and many were taken by well known connoisseurs in painting. From that time his vogue has been great, and he is now recognized, as one of the best painters in the United States."

After an absence of 15 years will again visit Waterloo every Saturday at Lock's Hotel, Waterloo.

His success in the treatment of piles can be amply attested by hundreds whom he cured during his former visits. I can cure any case of piles, no matter of how long standing, or how hopeless the case may be. The patient suffers no pain or inconvenience. In most cases one treatment is sufficient, which takes only a few minutes, and the time required for a cure is about two weeks, during which time the patient is not inconvenienced from business. 20tf

THE AUBURN COURIER.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF DeKALB COUNTY.

JAMES A. BARNS, Editor.

Registered at the Auburn, Indiana, postoffice as second-class matter.

THURSDAY............JULY 13, 1893

RAILROADS will soon give half fare excursions to Chicago.

THE World's Fair will probably soon be closed on Sunday.

JUSTICE BLATCHFORD, of the supreme court of the United States, is dead.

THE greatest day at the World's fair so far, was July 4, which showed a total of 325,000 admissions, including free passes.

GOVERNOR MATTHEWS says he has had no intention of calling an extra session of the legislature. He says there is no important thing to do.

OHIO is getting ready for this year's political campaign. It must be tiresome to have a red hot campaign every year. She ought to profit by the example of Indiana, and reduce the number of her elections.

LATER reports make the loss of life by the sinking of the British war ship, Victoria, 359. This includes the admiral, twenty-two other officers, and 336 men. All caused by trying to turn a big ship in too small a space.

DAILY SENTINEL of Indianapolis is now using machines to set its type. The Evansville Journal has been using machines for several months, and we are told the Ft. Wayne Journal is talking of putting them into its office.

POMEROY a town in Iowa of about 1,000 inhabitants was nearly destroyed by a cyclone last week. The loss of life was unusually great, over seventy being reported dead, in the town and within a few miles. The property loss is put at half a million.

SUNDAY, several lives were lost in the lake at Chicago. The day was so fair that many took row boats and sail boats for a ride on the water. A sudden squall caught them before they could reach the shore. Of those drowned was a man from Athens, Greece.

CHARGES of some sort have been filed against the present postmaster at Ft. Wayne, for the purpose of putting him out, and putting a democrat in. We do not favor this method, by any manner of means, unless the democrat incumbent of four years ago was served in the same way. A postmaster should be allowed to serve his full four years. Then if he don't go out, it will be time enough to bounce him.

TERRIBLE calamity at the world's fair Monday. At 1:30 p. m. fire broke out in the "Cold Storage" building. The smoke stack was over 300 feet high, and a tower of wood was built up around it to the top to make it look like a steeple. This caught fire near the top, and fire men went up to stop it. But the flames spread rapidly downwards, and cut off escape. Some jumped and were killed. Others went down when the tower fell. Seventeen lives were lost, and many hurt.

ALL parties are apparently asking for the repeal of the Sherman act, which compelled the government to buy a big amount of silver each month, and instead of coining it into dollars, lay it away and issue paper certificates for it. The law is no doubt a foolish one, for John Sherman is a sort of crank on money matters. But no one need expect that repealing this one act will cure all evils. There are many other republican mistakes to be righted besides the Sherman act.

$5. $10 and $20, Genuine Confederate Bills only five cents each; $50 and $100 bills 10 cents each. 25c and 50c shinplasters 10 cents each; $1 and $2 bills 25 cents each. Sent securely sealed on receipt of price. Address CHAS. D. PARKER, 90 S. Forsythe St., Atlanta, Ga. 29

A MAN living in a suburb of Chicago has been staying up town lately while his wife was off on a visit. The other day, he went down to see how things were at the house and found some thieves taking out his furniture, even the piano was at the door ready to go and a team was backed up at the rear gate. Two men were carry things out, but on seeing him jumped into the wagon and escaped.

HAD the Sherman act compelled the government to issue greenbacks for the monthly purchase of silver there might not have been so much trouble over the gold-or-silver certificates. After all the talk of the last twenty-five years, the greenback stands the test under all conditions. Had our government been controlled by business men instead of politicians, we would have had more greenbacks, instead of having greenbacks, retired and destroyed. For an example in imbecile financial management, we have only to look at the republican management since the war.

REPUBLICAN papers are very sorry that Cleveland was elected last fall. They are full to the brim with stuff about the hard times that came in with Cleveland's administration. But as Cleveland can do no more than see that the laws as he found them are enforced, for he is bound by an oath to do this, and as all the laws now in force, are the work of republican congress, we don't see how republican editors can be so ignorant as to blame Cleveland. Ignorance, however, is the leading trait of the average republican editor, as well as of many of their editors who claim to be above the average.

THE COLUMBIA CITY POST comes down from its self-erected high building, on the slippery side. It makes several assertions for which it has no authority whatever, and not even a suggestion except what its own ardent desires seem to suggest. It says "the editor of the COURIER insists he is not objecting to the recommendation of Mr. Brandon." Will the Post assert that we even mentioned this in any way? We think it will not, and why the Post makes the assertion we cannot see, unless it is getting anxious over the wild career its member of congress has made so far over the district in the matter of postoffices. But we are pleased at one thing the Post says, and that is that "The Post cannot name one man who signed Brandon's petition, for we know nothing about the matter." Of course they don't know anything about the matter, and we have been trying to impress on Mr. Adams the fact that he didn't. But the Post has continually been insisting that it did—that it knew more about the postoffice matter in Auburn than we in Auburn do. McNagny probably went back to Columbia City after his "interview with Auburn democrats," in which he avoided all of them, and told the Post that "Auburn favored Brandon." We in Auburn had never heard of this, and the COURIER told the Post so. But the Post kept on in several issues, saying it knew best. Now he admits he knew nothing about it. This places him on a level with an ordinary Auburn democrat, who also knows nothing about what McNagny and the Post have been asserting that, "the majority of Auburn democrats wanted a certain man, and the majority of them opposed a certain other man." There was nothing of this. The Auburn democrats were not consulted. We have said this often enough to secure a denial, if there was any chance to deny.

The Davis Hardware Failure.

One of the unfortunate things in a business community is the seemingly inevitable condition that will now and then cause a business man to fail. Such a condition seems to have overtaken John L. Davis. He has been in the hardware business here nearly a generation, and now at last, finds himself in trouble and has had to make an assignment for the benefit of his creditors. Frank E. Davenport was made assignee on Monday and as soon as his bond is accepted by the court, will be in charge both here and at Garrett. The trouble is caused partly by the poor business of the past year, and partly by the panicky times that we are now in. It cannot be called a bank failure, for though for many years Mr. Davis has received money on deposit and has bought and sold drafts, etc., yet we believe he has not been in the habit of loaning money to any great extent. We understand the money received on deposit has, in general, been kept in his hardware business only. He has a hardware store at Garrett similar to the one here, and has also done some bank business there. He has, in all, a great deal of property, which we are told will be used to save his creditors from loss. Parties in a position to know, say he has more than property enough to do this, and that he has good accounts due him at the store to more than pay all his outside debts due for goods, besides a large sum of other accounts that are not so good, but a part of which will no doubt be collected. This will leave the great bulk of his property to pay those he is indebted to here, in other words, his depositors. The trouble does not in any way affect the two banks in Auburn. Their business is as staunch as ever and people know it. And we do not apprehend it will affect the factories here to any great extent, possibly not at all, for we believe they can get money at the banks as usual, should they need it. Mr. Davenport had the store at Garrett closed on Monday, and the one here on Tuesday, and they will remain closed till an invoice is taken under order of court, which may mean a weeks or even longer. Mr. Davis, as a business man, has been long and favorably known, and our business men and people generally sympathyze with him in his misfortunes and hope they will be only temporary.

Two Runaways in One Day.

John C. Baker and his wife who reside near Fairview church in Concord, drove up to Ashley Monday, for Mr. Baker has a position on the new Wabash road. He was to stay there and his wife was to drive the rig home. But for some reason Mr. Baker started back with her, and when passing over a bridge, the horse took fright and shied, when in order to correct it, he struck it a blow or two with a whip. At once it began to kick, and came near hitting them in the buggy, finally breaking loose, and throwing them out. The buggy was rendered useless. Mr. Baker borrowed another and they reached Auburn all right. But in going east past the Glazier House, the horse shied again, this time as is supposed, at some boys playing football in J. W. Baxter's yard. The sudden jump threw Mrs. Baker out backwards, she falling over onto the hard roadbed. She was picked up badly bruised and shaken up and Mrs. Baxter and Mrs. Bachtel administered restoratives, and assisted her till she felt able to start again. The horse had been checked by Mr. Baker, with some difficulty, and getting another buggy, the lady was helped into it, and started for home again. We have not heard whether her injuries proved serious or not.

Ullery of Warsaw, is secretary. They have their second annual tournament at Warsaw, July 18. There will be excursions on the lakes, a banquet, and a good time generally.

The bicycle thieves we spoke of last week as escaping from Kendallville, were heard of later. The morning after their escape they came to some farm houses near Avilla, and told the people they had been robbed of their clothes. They had already stolen some lap robes which served as a sort of blanket to cover them, and these farmers gave them enough to fit them out decently, and they then went on. The Kendallville marshal followed, but they kept out of his reach.

One day recently says an exchange, the South Bend Woolen company bought from parties residing near Buchanan, Mich., a lot of wool This was brought to the mill and in the process of assorting it over a dynamite cartridge was found in the wool. This was carefully carried to the window and thrown out into the river, the cartridge exploding as it struck. Had this ever gotten into the machinery it would have played havoc with things and might have resulted in some one getting killed or maimed.

J. A. Shade, as noted last week, is back from Honduras. He and Mrs. Shade called to see us a few minutes last Friday. He presented ye editor a fine cane, a great curiosity here, it being made of the hard wood in the outside part of the trunk of a cabbage palm. It is very dark, hard and heavy, though he says, that the inside of these trees is very soft, being mere pith. He started home with many curios that he had collected, but lost most of them, by the upsetting of their boat, a small one in which they were coasting along the famous "Spanish Main." After a stay of several hours in the water, holding onto the boat, they were glad to be taken off. As they had on only their poorest clothes for the rough trip and lost all their good ones, they came near being refused a landing when they reached Belize. At last they took a steamer to Norfolk, Va., and thence came home by rail, Mr. Shade will take an early opportunity to give our citizens a lecture on the country there, and its products and prospects, especially with reference to its fruit growing interests. When the date is settled on, we hope to see him greeted by a good audience. To give an idea of the trip, we might add that he started home May 10, and reached here about the first of July.

Work on the new school house has begun. The ground is prepared for the stone work of the foundation and considerable stone is there ready for work to begin. F. K. Blake reached here Saturday coming in from Andrews, Ind., where Mrs. Blake had been visiting her people. E Smith of St Louis, was with them here, he being now on his way to his old home.

The raspberry crop came up rather short this year, except where the conditions were unusually good. W. H. McIntosh, while not in the fruit business as a business, always takes pains to have a fine crop for his own use. He had this years, the nicest and largest raspberries we have seen. And besides seeing, we have tasted them, for he and Mrs. M. favored our table with a nice mess of them on Monday.

Little Hortense, daughter of A. H. Gillis fell from near the top of the stairs last Friday, receiving serious injuries, though no bones were broken. Her face was badly bruised and the bridge of her nose crushed somewhat, though it is hoped it will not disfigure her. She must have fallen about twelve feet, striking some tools on a bench as she descended, then bounded off onto the floor several feet away. Mr. Gillis heard her and at once sprang to her aid, picking her up more dead than alive. At present she is getting along nicely.

W. H. McIntosh takes the bonds for the new school house, and makes this part of the transaction much more favorable to the town. The bonds had been intended to be made so that none could be paid until eleven years from date, and all were to begin at once. Now Mr. McIntosh will have the first come due in five years, and then $1,000 each year till all are paid. He also has arranged to take the bonds along as they are needed, so that all the interest will not begin now to accumulate, but each bond will begin to draw interest at the date it is taken and some may not be taken till fall. Altogether, the new arrangement is a great saving to the county.

The bicycle thieves who escaped from Kendallville last week as noted in the COURIER, were Angola boys, it would appear. They stole a bicycle from J. A. Woodhull and one from Frank Morse. It appears that one of the boys, at least, could not ride a bicycle, as one bicycle was found a short distance from that place.

'Squire Walborn's court had a provoke case on Monday. Mr. Tanberg had got into some sort of dispute with Uncle Ed. Sargent at Garrett, in the course of which Sargent called Tanberg an offensive name. Tanberg had him arrested on charge of "provoke" and the result was that Sargent paid out nearly $25 including costs.

Last fall I was taken with a kind of summer complaint, accompanied with a wonderful diarrhea. Soon after my wife's sister, who lives with us, was taken the same way. We used almost everything without benefit. Then I said, let us try Chamberlain's colic, cholera and diarrhea remedy, which we did, and that cured us right away. I think much of it, as it did for me what it was recommended to do. John Hertzler, Bethel, Berks county, Pa. 25 and 50 cent bottles for sale by Robbins & McCord.

Mrs. Mary V. Failing and her son Wallace, from Baldwinsville, Onondaga county, New York, a sister and nephew of T. J. Saxton of this place, are here on a general visit among their many relatives and friends in this vicinity. They are on their way home from Colorado Springs where they have been the past several weeks for the benefit of Wallace's health, which seems to have been perfectly restored during his stay there. They took in the World's fair both when they went and on their return, and now seem to feel more than satisfied with the result.

A Dangerous Fall.

Wm Murphy had a close call Monday afternoon. He was painting the sides of the new balcony of the Hollister House, when coming to the end of a plank, he stepped off and fell a distance of about twelve feet in the clear. Just below him Michael Kline was sitting on one of the limestone piers that are in place ready for the iron posts to be put on, Murphy struck Kline, his side coming onto Kline's shoulder, then striking onto Kline's knee and against Mr. Bowen who sat near by and thence bounded to the ground, the top of his head striking the projecting point of a stone in the gutter. Hollister had seen him fall and reached him as he struck, but not in time to save him from striking. He was at once taken up, badly jarred, and blood flowing freely from the scalp wound. Dr. Swartz gave him what assistance was needed, and R. W. Cobb took him into his buggy and took him home. He will be all right again in a short time. But if Mr. Kline had not been sitting on the stone pier, Murphy would have struck it square with his side and he would no doubt have been killed. Mr. Kline was not seriously injured, though he and Murphy got a large part of the bucketful of paint that came down when Murphy did.

At the Altar.

Two of Auburn's best known and most popular young people were united in marriage Tuesday afternoon. They were Frank B. Davenport son of F. E. Davenport and Minnie Zimmerman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Sylvester Zimmerman. The ceremony which was at 2:30 p. m., was performed by Rev. A. S. Wooton of the M. E. church, in the presence of about thirty of the immediate friends of both the contracting parties. The ceremony was very impressive and was preceded by the Mendelsson wedding march executed by Miss Lulu Rempis of Waterloo. W. C. Hartman acted as best man, and Miss Nellie Barns was bridesmaid. The bride looked charming and was dressed in exquisite taste in a dress of white brocaded silk, and carried bridal roses. The rooms were tastefully decorated with flowers and ferns by the young lady friends of the bride. The south bay window was made lovely with pendent hollyhocks and green ferns and vines, making a background of great beauty as the young couple and their attendants stood before it during the ceremony. At the conclusion, an excellent lunch was served, and soon after the happy couple took the west bound train over the B. & O. for Chicago, where they will spend a few weeks visiting the fair, and soon after will go to housekeeping in that city. Mr. and Mrs. Davenport start out on their new life with bright prospects and an abundance of good wishes from a wide circle of friends, among whom the editor and family are pleased to be classed, and with whom we join in congratulations and good wishes. It will not be amiss to add, that the young couple were well cared for in the way of wedding gifts, which were quite valuable, useful and very abundant. Those who attended from a distance were Mr. and Mrs. Peter Bishop, grandparents of the bride, from Spencerville; Mrs. Kagey from St. Joe; Mrs. J. R. Bittinger and daughter Marcia, of Ft. Wayne; John Bishop and wife of Michigan; George Kennedy and Lulu Rempis of Waterloo.

TEXAS believes in advertising. The latest from that State is a corpse that rolled over and cursed the coroner.

A WEST VIRGINIA moonshiner who has recently been arrested is six feet eleven inches high. Is this a proof that moonshine whisky will make a man grow?

THE wide range of subjects considered by the modern daily press is well shown by those journals which engage in poking fun at the sweet girl graduate and Mrs. Frank Leslie on one and the same page.

IF the real murderer of the Bordens will kindly step to the front and with uplifted hand say: "I cannot tell a lie—I did it with my twenty three little hatchets," he will win enduring fame and his heirs will grow rich by the sale of the hatchets.

A VINCENNES woman "playfully" pointed a target rifle at her 16-year-old-daughter; the gun grasped the coveted opportunity, so to speak, and the poor girl is suffering with a wounded knee. Seems as if a woman old enough to have a 16-year-old daughter ought to have more sense.

PARENTS should teach their boys to swim. It is an accomplishment of which every boy and girl in the nation should be possessed. It would reduce more than anything else the number of reports of harrowing deaths by drowning to be found in news columns daily after the opening of summer.

WHEN bicycles were novelties in Scotland, the question of regulating their speed was brought up before the local authorities of a southern town. A learned officer of the town gravely informed the court that the new mode of rapid transit came under the traction-engine law, and that every bicycle, unless he showed consideration, could be compelled to send a man on ahead, on foot, with a red flag, to warn pedestrians.

MAYOR HARRISON, of Chicago, showed a good deal of tact in the selection of a souvenir for the Spanish Princess. It would not have been good form to offer her jewelry or any of the thousand jimcracks that ladies admire, because she is supposed to have everything she wants. So the gallant Mayor gave her a copy of his book of travels around the world, which possessed the double advantage of having very little money value and of being a strictly personal offering.

KENT COUNTY jail, Rhode Island, boasts a woman jailer. She is Miss Evelyn Smith, and the position was given her because it had been held in direct line in her family since before the Revolution. When her predecessor died she was the only one left in the succession, and after slight opposition, she was appointed to her post. She is of commanding figure and well-developed muscle, and is well fitted to cope with a refractory prisoner. She is also said to exercise an admirable moral influence over her charges.

DES MOINES REGISTER: There are thousands of men who still believe that a few pounds of chemicals can change the course of the weather. If there is anything in these rainmaking theories the time will come when one farmer will punish another by invoking a rainstorm on his seasoned hay. If men can make rain at their will, we are going to have a wet time of it in some parts of the world. It may really subject people to more inconvenience than leaving it entirely to the Almighty.

BELIEF in witchcraft may be dying out in Christian lands, but it is dying slowly and, now and then, shows considerable vitality. Thus at Buchanan, Ga., one Wesley Shaw ordered an old woman, believed by the negroes to be a witch, off his land, and when she followed him, "to pick up his tracks," as the saying goes, he attempted to cut her "witch vein," wherever that is. Instead of doing that, he struck her jugular vein, and inflicted a fatal wound. Evidently there is room in that part of Georgia, if nowhere else in the State, for missionary effort.

THE operations of the great beef and pork packers, such as Armour and Swift, are more mammoth than are usually supposed. Not content with practically controlling the meat trade of the country, they are reaching out to swallow the hide and leather interests. The new tanneries about to be erected on the 4,000 acres of land owned by them at Tolleston, Ind., will have a capacity of handling more than 90 per cent. of our domestic hides. Representatives of these packers are also buying up hemlock and pine lands in Wisconsin and Michigan, in order that their supply of hemlock bark for tanning purposes may be unlimited. What is to be done about this immense monopoly?

THE average sum spent during the four years of a college course in some of the great Eastern universities amounts to a modest fortune and is one of the most striking evidences of growing national extravagance. The average amount spent by this year's class at Yale is given out by the class statistician as exceeding $4,300, or nearly $1,100 a year each for the 185 members. The largest sum spent by any member in any one year was $4,700, and the smallest amount $200. Twelve of the members of the class, however, paid all their expenses through college. Such facts show a lamentable tendency to make education an excuse for extravagance which in the end threatens to drive away many of the most promising students to more modest institutions. This will become truer as other universities improve.

AT last the good old county of Posey has been vindicated. It has been called the land of pumpkins and hoop-poles, and in a spirit of derision, too, despite the fact that pumpkins are good food and hoop-poles are held in high respect wherever flour is made. But Posey is not the original land of the pumpkin, as witnesseth this indenture from the Boston Journal: That reliable newspaper says that a century ago the Bostonian was not known as a "bean-eater," but as a "pompkin;" and finds the word defined in the "Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue" (published in 1788) as "A man or woman of Boston in America; from the number of pompkins raised and eaten by the people of that country. Pompkinshire: Boston, and its dependencies." Posey County is in good company, at any rate.

NOTICE is served in the Christian Union of the impending trial of an eleemosynary experiment which has long been discussed and is of unusual interest. The People's Bank Association hopes to open soon the first of several model pawn-offices for the poor. The legal rate at pawn-shops is 3 per cent. a month for the first six months, and 2 per cent. a month for succeeding months; but most pawnbrokers supplement these rates by charges for care of the articles pawned, so that as much as 800 per cent. per annum is sometimes paid to them for the use of money. The People's Bank Association proposes to begin by a charge of 1 per cent. a month, and expects to start with $100,000 capital, which is to earn 4-per-cent. dividends for its owners. The success of such a movement seems to depend simply on the shrewdness of the money-lender employed.

THE air is alive with reports of commercial failures, but the condition of the whole country is such as to prevent any general depression of values. It is an age of speculation, and if these recent failures serve to prevent the farmer from speculation it will be well. We do not mean gambling on 'Change, but the slower, yet not less risky plan, of putting in crops and raising stock without definite plan. Some men have a desultory hope that, by chance, grain and live stock will improve themselves. Fortunes were once made in the far West when cattle could be cheaply raised by reason of free pasturage and less competition in meat substitutes. Poor horses brought good prices, but steam and electricity have curtailed the market for all but the better grades. Crops, such as not so commonly raised should be the ambition of the progressive farmer, who also never forgets that the best of stock carefully handled rarely fails to bring excellent returns. Trite facts, these, yet slow to be heeded by the generality of our farmers.

IN Chicago the other night two persons were killed outright and a third one injured, perhaps fatally, by falling out of windows. At the same time a half a million people were crowding the streets, street cars and railways and boats and not one of them was so much as injured. These facts suggest that people are not always killed in expected places. One of the three persons who fell out of windows on that one night was Daniel Lord, Jr., a wealthy New York man who was the guest of a prominent Chicago family. His room was on the fourth floor of the palatial residence. He was a somnambulist. He arose during the night and walked, according to all suppositions, directly from his bed to the open window. A screen was not able to hold him back. He literally walked through and fell to the ground below. He lived only a few hours and all that he could utter was "the window." The second person of the Chicago trio was Minnie Berg, also a somnambulist. She fell out of the second story window and struck a hard pavement. The third person went to sleep sitting in a window and fell out, resulting in immediate death. It must be accepted as true that men and women in Chicago are safer on the streets and in the cars and boats than they are in their own homes.

Utilizing Former Waste.

Mr. W. Smith, the largest dealer in cheese in New York City, runs a factory which consumes ten million gallons of milk a year, and he tries to utilize as much as possible of it. So he has perfected means by which he saves the milk-sugar and expects to turn out 300,000 pounds of it this year, at the wholesale price of about sixteen cents a pound. Some heretofore waste parts are utilized in the production of poultry and duck food, and there is also produced a lactose vinegar which is recommended as a good table condiment, and a prophylactic against cholera.

Prayed for His Candidate.

The eccentric Father Taylor, the sailors' pastor of Boston, was a strong partisan of Governor Briggs. On one occasion, just previous to the latter's election, he was making the usual decorous prayer, asking the Lord to give the people for Governor "a man who will rule in the fear of God," etc., when he suddenly broke off: "Pshaw, Lord! What's the use of boxing the compass like that?—give us Governor Briggs!"

WHY WHEAT IS DOWN

TARIFF PREVENTS AN EXCHANGE OF COMMODITIES.

McKinley Worship Confined to Ohio—The President and Congress—An Open Secret of the Carpet Trade—Free Trade in Europe.

"Protecting" the Producer.

Our elevators are bursting with wheat for which the farmer can command but little more than 60 cents a bushel. There are in Europe alone, if we may credit the statement made by the late Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Rusk, 150,000,000 people who never eat wheaten bread. In the one country is an immense supply of visible food waiting for buyers. In the other countries are millions who go to bed hungry. Between them ply daily ferryboats, with freight charges reduced to a minimum. What prevents an exchange that means benefit to both sides, needed food to the one and needed markets to the other? Not the sea, for it costs no more to send a bushel of wheat abroad than to send a letter in the mail, but the McKinley bill, which takes from the farmer, or his middleman, one-third or one-half of the commodities for which he might exchange this surplus wheat in foreign markets as a fine for not buying those commodities from some protected home producer.

It is clear, then, that whatever direct benefits may come to classes from release of taxes on the necessaries they consume or on material with which they work, the great general good to be sought in tariff revision is a healthy expansion of foreign commerce. This was the immediate result of the Walker tariff in 1846. During the twenty-five years previous our foreign trade had not doubled. In 1822 it was $141,000,000. In 1846 it had grown to $227,000,000, an increase of but 60 per cent. Under the low revenue tariff enacted in that year it swelled by 1860 to $687,000,000, a growth of more than 200 per cent. in fourteen years. More significant and instructive still was the increase in the tonnage of American shipping engaged in the foreign trade. For thirty years prior to 1846 it had been nearly stationary. In that year it was only 943,307 tons, almost 40,000 less than in 1810. By 1860 it reached 2,379,396 tons. These figures speak volumes, but their chief encouragement is for those who produce the surplus products that must have other markets besides our own for remunerative sales.

The tariff of 1846 made a vent for our surplus products by opening a market for the things which, and which alone, other people had to exchange for them. Yet this rapid expansion of imports brought no distress to home manufacturers. On the contrary, after eleven years' experience of that tariff they assented, almost unanimously, to a further decrease of 20 per cent.

The party of low tariff and revenue duties is not about to try a new and dangerous experiment. It has no new-fangled theory which it wishes to test upon the body politic. It has not only the support of reason but this solid justification of experience in the form it proposes to make by purging our laws of the duties that smell of monopoly and securing the sovereign power of taxation from private control.—N. Y. World.

The Ohio Bourbons.

The Republican Bourbons of Ohio do not receive from the party journals of the country that ardent indorsement which they had expected. There is a general feeling that they have made a very bad mess of it. There were three points in the action of the Ohio Republicans: (1) McKinleyism with no change save in the direction of higher duties; (2) prohibitory duties on wool; (3) opposition to any Democratic reform of pensions. Then there was, of course, the complacent appeal to the past, and blindness toward the future. Even the most zealous organs of the party say that, however this may work in Ohio, it is, for national purposes, simply inviting a contest on the lines where overwhelming defeat was encountered last fall.

Undoubtedly this criticism is just enough, but we do not see exactly how the Ohio Republicans could have done very differently. In the first place, they had to nominate McKinley, because there was no one else of sufficient importance to replace him safely. It would have been most unsatisfactory to renominate McKinley and repudiate McKinleyism. He is a platform in himself, and if the resolutions had been made ever so mild and perfunctory, the effect on the public mind would have been practically the same. In the next place, having to take McKinley and McKinleyism, the cry for prohibitory duties on wool—absurd and stupid as it is—was a logical consequence, because that is one of the characteristic features of the man and the ism. Finally, having been forced to offend all sensible men on the question of the tariff, the anti-pension reform notion followed easily, and almost as a matter of course. The Ohio Republicans are shut in to a campaign of stubborn prejudice, and the prejudice as to pensions is shared by the same class that cling to the prejudice as to protection. It is a foolish piece of business, but it was not to be helped. Whether McKinley is elected or defeated this fall, the effect on the national work of the party will be unfavorable. The whole business is only an incident in a very long game, which will not come to an end for at least three years yet.—New York Times.

The President and Congress.

What this country is suffering from just at present is distrust of the outcome of reckless legislation during the last Republican administration. The law requiring the Government to buy practically the entire output of the silver mines in the United States and store it away in vaults, and the other one of fostering certain industries at the expense of the people at large, has almost entirely destroyed that confidence in the future without which complex modern business life cannot be maintained in a healthful condition. In calling Congress to meet in extra session, President Cleveland has done what the situation requires. The Sherman and the McKinley acts must be repealed if there is to be a return to that trustful and hopeful state which these measures shattered. The money of the people must be no longer wasted in efforts at bolstering up the losing business of the silver mines, and the general public must be no longer taxed for the benefit of the monopolists of Pennsylvania and other favored sections.

President Cleveland's proclamation has already produced good results. It has been accepted as a guarantee that the Democratic party is as right on the financial question as it is on that of the tariff. It is a notification on his part, in consequence of what he had said before, that the majority of members in Congress are reasonably certain of voting in favor of the repeal of the Sherman law, and that there is no doubt at all concerning their position toward the McKinley bill. The President said some time ago that he would not call an extra session unless he felt sure that he could depend on a majority to sustain him in his opposition to the further purchases of silver by the Government. It is plain, therefore, that the Sherman act is short-lived.

That the country is in a panicky condition may be inferred from the fact that the business failures during the past six months, according to one of the mercantile agencies, show liabilities of $168,920,839 as against $62,273,680 for the corresponding period of the preceding year. In other words, the sum total put in jeopardy by the bankruptcies of the last six months is not far from three times as much as it was for the first six months of 1892. These figures are doubtless discouraging, but they are not as bad as some of the best-posted men in these matters expected. The number of failures for the last six months is 6 to 5, compared with the corresponding six months of 1892, which shows that while there was no very great increase in the unfortunate firms, they were much more deeply involved.

There is a lesson in these figures with which Mr. Cleveland doubtless was familiar when he issued his call for the extra session. Concerns which owed large sums of money found it impossible to borrow any more in consequence of the general distrust instilled by the Sherman and McKinley laws. While the one made the value of a dollar uncertain, the other threw doubt on the healthfulness of the country's growth in manufactures. When Congress meets next month it will probably not hesitate a moment to speak decisively concerning the country's future fiscal and tariff policies, and speak on the right side, too.—New York News.

Blessing of High Wages.

My aim in this inquiry is to ascertain beyond peradventure whether protection or free trade best accords with the interests of those who live by their labor. I differ with those who say that with the rate of wages the state has no concern. I hold with those who deem the increase of wages a legitimate purpose of public policy. To raise and maintain wages is the great object that all who live by wages ought to seek, and workingmen are right in supporting any measure that will attain that object. Nor in this are they acting selfishly, for, while the question of wages is the most important of questions to laborers, it is also the most important of questions to society at large. Whatever improves the condition of the lowest and broadest social stratum must promote the true interests of all. Where the wages of common labor are high and remunerative employment is easy to obtain, prosperity will be general. Where wages are highest, there will be the largest production and the most equitable distribution of wealth. There will invention be most active and the brain best guide the hand. There will be the greatest comfort, the widest diffusion of knowledge, the purest morals and the truest patriotism. If we would have a healthy, a happy, an enlightened, and a virtuous people, if we would have a pure government, firmly based on the popular will and quickly responsive to it, we must strive to raise wages and keep them high. I accept as good and praiseworthy the ends avowed by the advocates of protective tariffs. What I propose to inquire is whether protective tariffs are in reality conducive to these ends.—Henry George, in Protection or Free Trade.

The Coming Tariff Bill.

A very considerable number of statesmen are now engaged in drafting tariff bills which they hope to have adopted as administration measures. By far the best of these, as we are familiar with them, is that drawn under the auspices of the New York Reform Club. That bill is based squarely on the Democratic platform of tariff for revenue only, and the bill the Ways and Means Committee reports must be equally as good if it is to be forced through Congress in the name of the Democratic party.

To be supported by the genuine tariff reformers of the Democratic party, the tariff bill must not take from the free list any article that is now untaxed; it must not impose taxes that will average over 30 per cent.; it must not provide any rate that is high enough to be restrictive, whether the article on which it is levied is made in this country or not; it must reduce duties to a rate that will produce no surplus above the ordinary expenses of the Government, leaving pensions to be provided for by a special tax, and finally it must make taxation lightest on such necessaries of life as clothing, leaving the heaviest duties to be levied on articles of luxury.—St. Louis Republic.

Peck Has Skipped the Country.

The reason given for the flight of ex-Commissioner Chas. F. Peck is that he has gone abroad under a commission for a syndicate of protection Republican newspapers to write up the condition of the working classes of Europe, and for this he is to receive $1,000 a month and expenses. This story may be very well for his friends to give out to account for his sudden departure, but we hardly think any Republicans are fools enough to trust him with a mission of that character. A man that plays traitor in one act is likely to continue it, and if the collection of statistics is needed by McKinleyites they would put the responsibility of their collection in the hands of some one they could trust to do the work they wanted to their liking, as it is plain Peck's word will never be worth a cent in the future to any party. The wage-earners of this country, however, should warn the labor unions of Europe the kind of man who is visiting them and the injury he is likely to do them by falsification, for we presume he will try and not disclose his identity in any work he may be engaged in.—American Industries.

Selling Carpets in Europe.

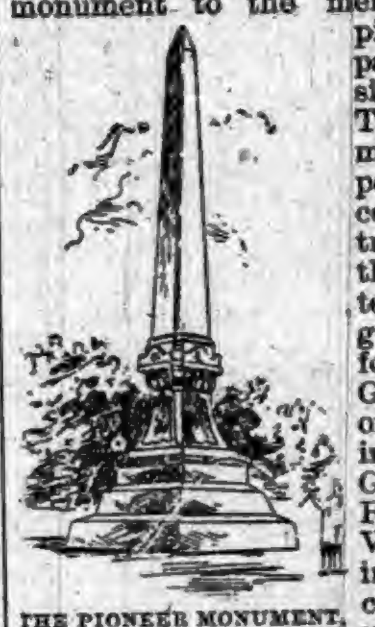
We learn from the American Wool and Cotton Reporter that American carpet manufacturers are now looking for an outlet for their surplus production in England and other foreign countries. It says that at a recent auction sale of carpets by the Alex. Smith & Sons Company a number of lots were taken for shipment to Canada and England, and that the price, less rebates, was 10 to 12 cents below the English manufacturers' price. There must be some mistake about this, which Gov. McKinley should at once explain. He knows very well that it is the English manufacturer who does the underselling, and that if he had not come to the rescue with his increased duties, giving the American maker protection of from 19 to 60 cents a yard and 40 per cent. additional, every mill in the country would have been closed, and the Republican campaign fund cut down in a way to cause universal distress.—New York Evening Post.

THERE is a tariff of 11 cents a pound on wool. Our protection friends say that if you take off the tariff it will reduce the price just that much. Unwashed wool is now quoted at 7 cents per pound. By taking off the tariff the farmers would be obliged to pay a bonus of 4 cents a pound to the one who would take the wool off their hands.

FOR KASKASKIAN PIONEERS.

Dedication of a Monument to the Memory of Thousands.

There has just been dedicated with imposing ceremony, at Kaskaskia, a monument to the memory of 5,000 pioneers of that part of the Mississippi valley. The remains of many of these people had recently been transferred from the old cemeteries in the low grounds at the foot of Fort Gage to the top of a hill, a spot immortalized by General George Rogers Clark, a Virginian, who in 1778, with a company of volunteers, captured Fort Gage from the British.

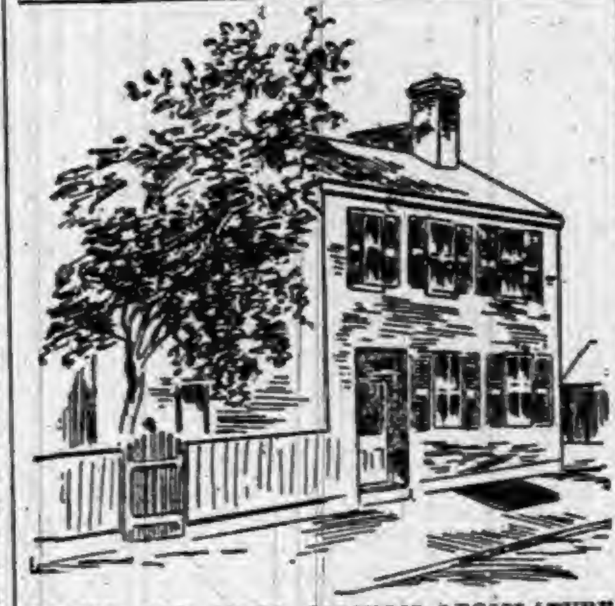


THE PIONEER MONUMENT, KASKASKIA.

The ceremonies of dedication comprised a speech by Cyrus L. Cook, of Edwardsville, one of the commissioners of the State; response by Wm. Hartzell, of Chester; addresses upon "The Historical Reminiscences of Old Kaskaskia" and "History of the Appropriation for the Removal of the Dead;" the reading of "The Declaration of Independence" and a poem, "The Capture of Fort Gage." The monument is a granite shaft, with plinth, die, and bases in appropriate design, standing twenty-six feet high, and bearing the following inscription:

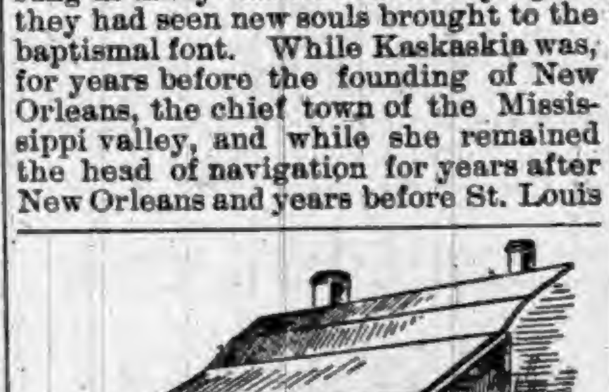
"Those who sleep here were first buried at Kaskaskia and afterward removed to this cemetery. They were the early pioneers of the great Mississipi Valley. They planted free institutions in a wilderness and were the founders of a great commonwealth. In memory of their sacrifices Illinois gratefully erects this monument. 1892."

To the sentimental reader these ceremonies suggested much more than the setting up of a monument. They had much to cause the patriotic Illinoisan to think. A brilliant galaxy of statesmen, politicians, soldiers, jurists and lawyers gave Kaskaskia a place unique in history. Gen. Shields, warrior, statesman and Senator of three States, is buried in Carroll County, Missouri, almost in sight of the Missouri River. The body of Elias Kent Kane, one of the first United States Senators elected by Illinois, lies in the bluffs above Kaskaskia, three miles from the monument. The grave is isolated. It is marked by a stone giving the date of birth and death, but little more. The remains of Judge Sydney Breese are buried in Clinton County. Those of Governor Ninian J. Edwards lie in St. Clair County. The late General John Pope, the son of Judge Nathaniel Pope, born in Kaskaskia and reared there, lie in Bellefontaine Cemetery. Those of Judge Pope, his father, were buried at Kaskaskia. The body of Daniel Pope Cook, one of the first Congressmen elected by the new State, is buried in Northern Illinois. These men came to Kaskaskia when it was the territorial capital, and when it was thought to be the coming capital of the coming State. Some of them even drifted there after the territorial admission in 1818. When the capital was located at Vandalia, and it was evident that there was no future for Kaskaskia, the men with political ambition turned away.



WHERE THE FIRST ILLINOIS LEGISLATURE MET.

At that time the population of the cemetery was larger than that of Kaskaskia. The town was then much more than a century old. Since the date of baptism of the child of Michael and Mary Aco, March 20, 1695, a century and a quarter had passed. In that long time the fathers of the church had sung as many masses for the dying as they had seen new souls brought to the baptismal font. While Kaskaskia was, for years before the founding of New Orleans, the chief town of the Mississippi valley, and while she remained the head of navigation for years after New Orleans and years before St. Louis became her successful rivals, her population never exceeded 1,000. The cemetery grew much faster than the town, and the time following the exodus of 1820 would have found it considerably ahead if a comparative census had been possible. The fate of the town could then be foreseen. In 1766 Capt. Philip Pittman, a British army engineer, writing of Fort Chartres, on the Mississippi River, about thirteen miles from Kaskaskia, saw and predicted the encroachment of the river on the Illinois shore. Kaskaskia was doomed if engineering skill could not be brought to her protection.



THE OLD KASKASKIA INN.

The high water of 1844, which cut a new channel across the point, made it clear that Capt. Pitman's prophesy of the destruction of the city would in time be fulfilled, and the question of removing the dead from the doomed cemeteries was discussed. Nothing was done, however, till about nine years ago, when Father Ferland succeeded in interesting the State authorities in the matter. A plat of ground was purchased, and the monument just dedicated was agreed upon.

One of the graves left untouched was that of Pierre Menard. When the State dedicated the monument to Menard at Springfield it proposed to take up his remains and remove them, at its own expense, to the State capital and bury them with appropriate honors and ceremonies at the foot of the monument. His descendants objected to the removal at that time, and promised, when reminded of the danger of their being carried away, to remove them. Last year the relatives again objected and renewed the promise to have the corpse disinterred and taken to a place of safety. With that understanding the body of Menard was left almost alone in the old burial ground. The water is now not one hundred feet away from it.

A Ruinous Loss.

Why is it that people in general are so prone to disregard loss of strength, clearly perceptible in bodily shrinkage, failure of appetite, broken rest? Incomprehensible but true. Sheer carelessness, an overweening confidence in the power of nature to recuperate—these are suggestible reasons. One of the most observable signals of danger thrown by distressed nature is waning strength. An efficient tonic is the best safeguard against impending peril. Among the invigorants which modern science has developed and experience approved is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, and it occupies the first place. Digestion, renewed by this genial stomachic, compensates for a drain of vital force, and a regular action of the bowels and tranquil condition of the nerves, both insured by its use, co-operate in the complete restoration of vigor. The Bitters remedies liver and kidney trouble and malaria.

Compressed Air Experiment.

The Mekarski compressed air system of operating street railways will shortly be introduced in Washington for investigation. A railroad working on this system has been in operation in Berne, Switzerland, since October 1, 1890. It is about two miles long, and is worked by a fifty horse-power turbine plant. The maximum air pressure in the locomotive reservoir amounts to 450 pounds to the square inch, and the time required to charge each reservoir is ten minutes. In the city the speed is reduced to seven and one-half miles an hour, but outside the city a speed of thirty miles an hour is permitted. The experiments to be made in Washington will have a much better plant than the Berne Railway.

Measuring the Infinitesimal.

The capacity of human comprehension is not a little tasked at the conclusion arrived at by scientists, who, it now appears, have succeeded in measuring the thickness of the envelope of soapy water inclosing the air of the bubble when it has become so thin as to produce rainbow tints. Thus, when showing the shade of violet, it was one-fourth the thickness of the length of an ordinary violet wave of light—1-60,000 of an inch—a thickness that is, equal to 1-240,000 of an inch. As the bubble continued to expand a black patch was found to be only one-fortieth of that of the violet section, or just about 1-10,000,000 of an inch.

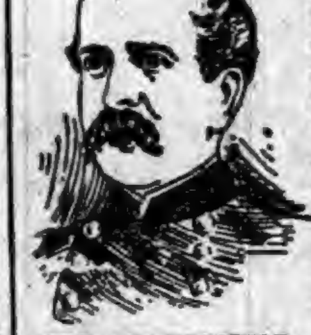
GETTYSBURG'S GALLANT HEROES ARE HONORED.

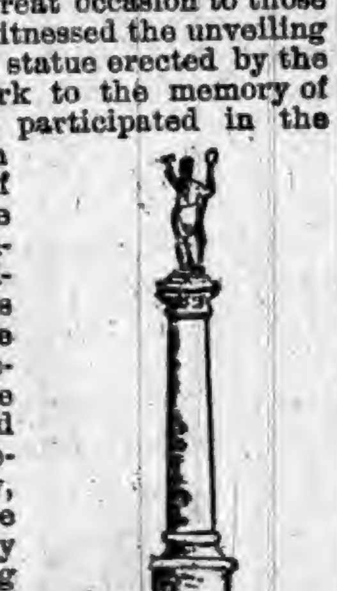
New York State Dedicates an Appropriate Monument on the Battlefield—Addresses by Bishop Potter, Governor Flower and Others—Ten Thousand Were Present.

Monument to Their Memory.



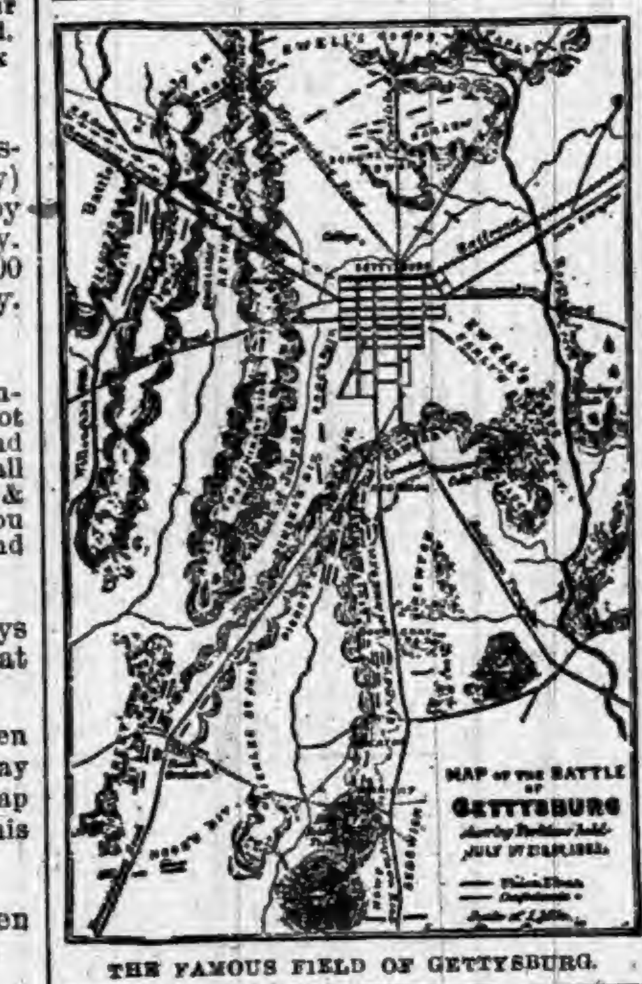
GEN BUTTERFIELD.

Thirty years have passed away since the eventful battle that turned the tide of the civil war. Hundreds and thousands of the men who rallied around the flags of both armies have gone to their reward within that thirty years. Time, so prone to obliterate those landmarks which would serve to keep fresh the events of long ago, has dealt lightly with this most reverenced battlefield. Being within the Union lines and away from the center of hostilities, its prominent features have been preserved intact. The events of Gettysburg impressed themselves upon the minds of the participants with a distinctness greater than did those of almost any battle of the rebellion. However this may be, the veterans of the State of New York who took part in the battle of Gettysburg have long been looking forward to the thirtieth anniversary of the battle with great anticipations. Saturday, Sunday and Monday was a great occasion to those veterans, for it witnessed the unveiling of a magnificent statue erected by the State of New York to the memory of its citizens who participated in the battle. Through the generosity of the Empire State each of the organizations participating has its monument on the historic field. Besides these there has been erected in the battle-scarred cemetery, which saw the death of so many brave men during the three days of the battle, a splendid shaft for the State at large. It is this which was unveiled during the recent reunion of New York veterans there. The monument cost the snug sum of $60,000.



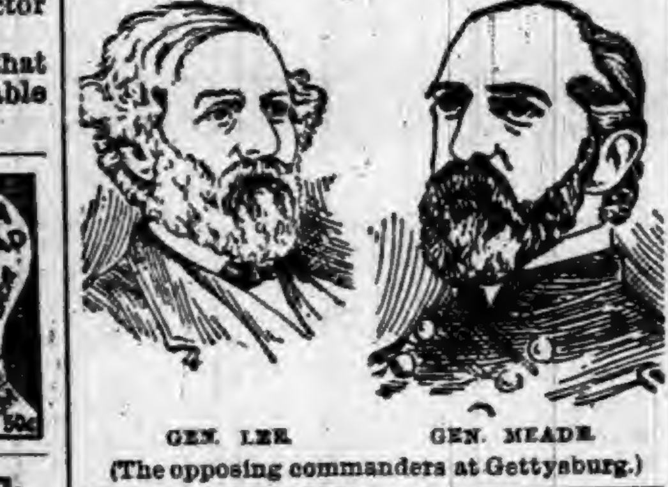
NEW YORK'S GETTYSBURG MONUMENT.

Several years ago the New York Board of Commissioners of Gettysburg Monuments was organized, with Maj. Gen. Daniel E. Sickles chairman, and Maj. Gens. Henry W. Slocum, Joseph B. Carr, Charles A. Richardson and Josiah A. Porter, with A. J. Zabriskie as engineer. In order that as many suvivors as possible might be present the State provided free transportation to all such from their homes to the battlefield and return, and the veterans who availed themselves of this transportation numbered over 7,000. Many of them brought wives, daughters or sons, and with the veterans from other States and the guests of veterans over 10,000 people were there. Every hotel was packed to the roof, and every private house was transformed into a hotel annex. Railway cars on the sidings were filled and several hundred tents on East Cemetery Hill afforded shelter for veterans who rolled themselves in blankets and were happy in the memories of old times.



THE FAMOUS FIELD OF GETTYSBURG.

The greatest day of the reunion was Sunday, and this day will go down in history as one of the greatest at Gettysburg since its wheat fields ran red with the blood of Confederate and Union dead. The wheat stood ripe on the stalk as it did thirty years ago when the armies of Meade and Lee met and the Union troops gleaned victory after three days' varying conflict. Smoke again hung over the field, but it was the salute in honor of the dead and not the smoke of battle. The dedicatory address was delivered by Bishop Potter. Gen. Sickles presided and made a short address, and was followed by Gov. Flower and others. A poem was read, and prayer was offered by Rev. Mr. Derrick, a colored veteran. Hymns and songs were sung by a trained choir in attendance. Major General Daniel Butterfield, who was chief of staff of the Army of the Potomac at the time of the battle, was Grand Marshal. In view of the advanced age and decrepitude of many of the survivors, he wisely determined not to have any long line of march, but there was a review of all who could be mustered, the reviewing officers being Gov. Flower, who was present with his staff, and Secretary of War Lamont. The column was headed by Gen. George S. Greene, of the Twelfth Corps, who is 92 years of age, and probably the oldest survivor of the battle.



GEN. LEE. GEN. MEADE.
(The opposing commanders at Gettysburg.)

The Battle of Gettysburg.

There can be no question but that the battle of Gettysburg was the turning point of the civil war. The defeat of Lee in those eventful three days thirty years ago broke the backbone of the Confederate army, and to no one was this more evident than to Lee himself. Not only was he aware that he could never get together such an army again, but the strength of the Federal troops displayed at Gettysburg disheartened his men to a considerable degree. It is believed by many that if Gen. Meade had followed up his victory when he had the Confederates practically within his grasp at the Potomac, the war would have been soon ended. Meade wanted to do this, but he called a council of war, the council advised delay, and lo! the bird had flown. The river had gone down enough for the enemy to cross and a golden opportunity had been lost. Thus it will be seen how important was the battle of Gettysburg, a battle neither army expected nor desired, but which was brought on by accident.

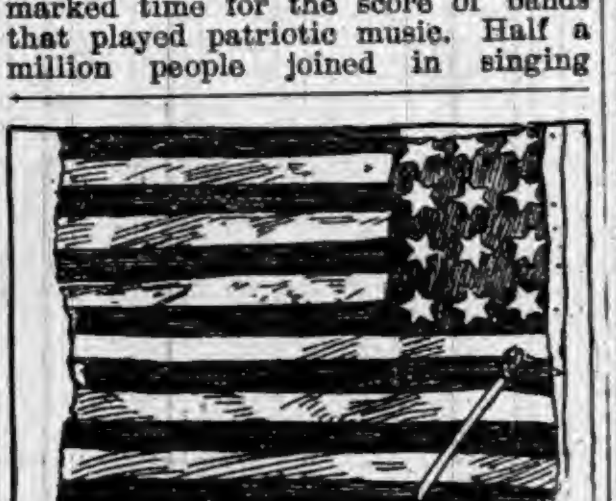
'TWAS A GLORIOUS FOURTH.

A General Celebration Throughout the Country—At the World's Fair.

The Fourth of July was more generally observed throughout the country this year than ever before. In Chicago, especially, never was day celebrated as was the one hundred and seventeenth anniversary of that noon when a few brave men, wiser than their generation, first preached to the amazed nations the glorious gospel of human liberty and the dignity of mere manhood. The time-honored old bell that on that day rang the matins of freedom's dawning found voice again, and in the magic White City by the lake pealed the summons to liberty's double jubilee, while to its now cracked and quavering tones the joybells of the nation responded in brazen chorus.

From the farthermost ocean-lashed crag of rugged New England to the golden sands of California, and from the wheat-sea fields of Minnesota to the savannahs of Florida's peninsula, a free people blessed the day when sprang into existence the government "of the people, by the people and for the people." Before sunrise the noisy enthusiasm began to tell the world of its happiness, and long after the anniversary day closed in night the hissing rocket and detonating bomb streaked the gray sky with bars of fire as brightly red as are the stripes of the flag that these pyrotechnic heralds told "was still there."

In Chicago, the celebration was confined to the exercises at the World's Fair grounds, but these were so magnificent and of such historic interest as to eclipse anything of the kind ever before attempted. There were in attendance the largest number of persons ever gathered in one assemblage in this country. There were eloquent speakers by the dozen to address the multitude. Cannon from ship and shore marked time for the score of bands that played patriotic music. Half a million people joined in singing "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean," "The Star-Spangled Banner," and similar inspiriting songs, while from every flagstaff in the grounds the American flag did float.



THE ORIGINAL STARS AND STRIPES.

Program of Exercises.

The crowd assembled on the plaza west of the administration building, where stands for the speakers were erected. From the warships in the lake off the Exposition grounds was fired the national salute, and then the following program was observed:

Prayer—Rev. John Henry Barrows, of Chicago.
Opening Address—Adlai E. Stevenson, Vice President of the United States.
Song—"Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean."
Address—Carter H. Harrison, Mayor of Chicago.
Address—Hampton L. Carson, of Philadelphia.
Salute of the flags.
Song—"Star-Spangled Banner."
Oration and reading of the Declaration of Independence by James S. Norton, of Chicago.
Song—"My Country, 'Tis of Thee."
Doxology.

At the close of Mr. Carson's speech there was unfurled to the breeze from off the staff on the Administration Building the original American flag, the same one that flew from the peak of the American frigate Bon Homme Richard when under command of the great Paul Jones she engaged in the famous combat with the British warship Serapis. This relic of the revolution was swung into place by Mrs. R. P. Stafford, a descendant of Lieut. Stafford, of the Bon Homme Richard, and now owner of this precious memento of the war for independence. As the Paul Jones flag straightened in the breeze every flag aloft in the park was dipped in honor to the bit of historic bunting, and the guns in the park and on the ships joined with thunderous tones in the applause that went up from the people.

At night a magnificent display of fireworks surpassing anything of the kind yet shown at the fair was given.

He Can't Find an Honest Man.

An old gentleman, evidently a gatherer of statistics, but with a kindly face which shaded off to something like philanthropy about the edges, was gazing abstractedly down the street.

Suddenly he stepped up to a gentleman who was waiting for a horse car, and, touching him lightly on the shoulder, said: "Excuse me, but did you just drop a $5 bill?" at the same time holding out in his hand the sum mentioned.

The gentleman questioned gazed a moment at the note, assumed a look of excitement, made hasty search of his pockets and said: "Why, so I did, and I didn't miss it," holding out his eager hand.

The old man slowly drew forth a note book and said: "I thought so." He then took the name and address of the loser and, putting the note in his pocket, turned away.

"Well," said the other, "do you want it as a reward?"

"Oh, I did not find one," returned the benevolent old man, "but it struck me that in a big place like New York there must be a large quantity of money lost, and upon inquiry I find you are the thirty-first man who lost a $5 note this very morning."

Long Legs and Short Tails.

Birds with long legs always have short tails. Writers on the flight of birds have shown that the onluse of a bird's tail is to serve as a rudder during the act of flight. When birds are provided with long legs these are stretched directly behind when the bird is flying, and so act as a sort of a rudder.

A CHICAGO shoe manufactory makes 20,000 pairs of "dead men's shoes" every month. The soles are of pasteboard, covered with grain paper, the uppers are of quilted satin and crochet work, and a ribbon tied in a bow knot holds the shoe to the foot.

"LITTLE" FAULKENBURGH of Perry County, and Joseph Jones, of Crawford, have been indicted at Eckerty for participating in the hanging of John Davidson five years ago.

ERNEST BONO, Vincennes saloon keeper, while driving near that city, noticed the big railroad trestle on fire. He ran a half mile, flagged a passenger train and averted a disastrous wreck.

THE body of a man who has been killed by a Lake Shore train was picked up by an east-bound freight crew near LaPorte. Letters found in the dead man's coat give the name of Allen Blair, of Pennsylvania.

FOUR boys were walking up the slopes of a coal mine near Rosedale, when three empty cars rushed down and caught them. Joseph Crave, aged 13, was instantly killed; Otto Crogan, aged 14, received fatal injuries, and Rolla Crogan and Joe Blacketer, aged 11 and 13, respectively, had bones broken.

MILTON PLILEY, foreman of the straw department at the strawboard factory, Gas City, dropped dead instantly while at work. He was a man of brawny stature and apparently good health, and only an autopsy could throw any light on the cause of his death, which came from heart disease. The body was taken to his home in Marion.

A STRANGE murder occurred at Jeffersonville. Some young men were discussing the merits of the Claysburg baseball club. Eugene Hogue, aged 20, walked by and heard some one say that out of seven games the team lost only one. Hogue said he thought they had lost two. The words were hardly uttered before some one struck him a blow behind the left ear, and he fell forward. He got up and walked a mile to his home, where he died inside of a few hours. It is not known who struck the blow. Several who were in the crowd have been arrested.

GEORGE CARROLL, aged 30, and his nephew, George Dale, aged 10, were drowned in the Wabash River, at Terre Haute. Dale and his little sister were wading in the river, and got beyond their depth. Their struggles and screams attracted the attention of Carroll, who lives near the river, and the young man, without disrobing, went to the rescue. He succeeded in getting the girl to a place of safety, but the boy struggled, making it impossible for the man to manage him in deep water, and both sank to the bottom and were drowned. The bodies were recovered.

CHAUNCEY VERMILLION, a wealthy farmer, residing near Andrews, narrowly escaped death by hanging. While engaged in elevating hay, in the mow of the barn, a noose of the rope caught Vermillion around the neck, and before the horse used in hoisting the loads could be stopped the unfortunate man was lifted forty feet to the roof. A tangle in the rope left the farmer suspended in mid air, and a farm hand barely succeeded in cutting him down before death by strangulation ensued. Mr. Vermillion fell from the top of the barn to the loaded wagon, and from there to the floor. He is lying in a critical condition.

HATTIE CASHIER, 7, living near Brazil, recently stepped on a rusty nail. It pierced her foot and now she is dying of lockjaw.

THE east-bound passenger train, running at high speed struck a buggy at Marion, containing Miss Daisy Hummell, Miss Eva Ihrig, and Mrs. John B. Heath. Miss Ihrig was instantly killed, being broken and bruised to a jelly. Mrs. Heath was severely injured, while Miss Hummell escaped with a few slight bruises. The buggy was demolished. You want the Best

Royal Baking Powder never disappoints; never makes sour, soggy or husky food; never spoils good materials; never leaves lumps of alkali in the biscuit or cake; while all these things do happen with the best of cooks who cling to the old-fashioned methods, or who use other baking powders.

If you want the best food, Royal Baking Powder is indispensable.

Put the Onus on the Parson.

A very amusing dialogue took place between a minister of the gospel and a railroad engineer at a little station on the Louisville and Nashville railroad the other day. After conversing a while with the engineer the minister asked him if he understood his business, and wanted to know what the railroad man did when he wanted the engine to move forward and backward.

"Well, when I want the engine to go forward, I throw the lever forward and the engine goes, and when I want to go backward I just reverse the lever."

"Now," said the engineer, "do you understand your business?"

"Well, I guess I do," replied the minister.

"Well, let me hear you say the Lord's prayer," said the engineer.

The preacher repeated the Lord's prayer, but when he was asked to repeat it backward he could not do it.

"Well, I guess I do not think you understand your business," said the engineer, as he threw forward his lever and started on his way.—Louisville Commercial.

He Stole a Safe.

An enterprising burglar has just been tried in Covington, Ky. The culprit was arraigned on the charge of grand larceny. The venerable Judge took his seat, and, when the culprit's name was called, asked, in his stereotyped way, what the charge was. The court officer responded:

"Grand larceny, Your Honor."

"Of what nature was the theft?" again asked the Judge.

"Why," said the court officer, "he stole a burglar-proof safe."

The Judge nearly fainted when he heard this startling piece of information, but recovering took off his spectacles and gave the court officer a look which plainly asked if he was being taken for an opium victim.

"Stole what?" said His Honor, nearly spellbound.

The Chief of Police then came to the poor officer's assistance, and volunteered the information that the prisoner had stolen the different parts of the safe from the safe factory in Cincinnati in which he was employed, and put it together at his home at night.

Capitalists in Humble Employment.

On Philadelphia's police force is a man worth $150,000 whose income is about $15,000 yearly, outside of his $20 a week pay. A car driver receives $2,000 from real-estate investments in the Tenth Ward. A letter carrier appointed by Postmaster Huidekoper, and still doing duty, is worth $20,000, and a man who serves newspapers from door to door has money at interest to the amount of $60,000. The head waiter in a Market street eating house is worth $30,000, and a cook in one of the city's hotels owns $60,000 in bank stock and $25,000 in real estate. The sexton of one of the poorest churches in the town has a yearly income of $7,500 derived from Government bonds.—Philadelphia Press.

A Trifling Subject.

A young woman of this city, whose quick wit is responsible for the loss of a number of friends, has just seen another retire from the list.

The young man was in a philosophical mood, and remarked:

"Self-study is a bad thing."

"I shouldn't be surprised," she responded flippantly.

"Now, I am sure that if I were to devote time to thinking about myself I should become very narrow-minded."

"Oh, yes; you'd probably have to in order to grasp the subject."

And for the time he really felt as small as she had pictured him.—Washington Star.

The Pope's Visitors.

King Oscar of Sweden is a very simple-minded man. When he went to see the Pope he kissed the holy father on both cheeks. Such a salute was quite irregular, long usage having established the custom of kissing only the Pope's hand. This rule was only broken once, in the case of the late pontiff, by a President of the United States. Gen. Grant simply shook him by the hands and said: "How do you do, sir?"

Ditches.

Ditches that have been made for drainage, but which have not been cleared out, do more harm than good. Unless the water can freely flow out of a ditch the ground will be kept wet. A ditch should be thoroughly cleaned at least once a year, as it will become partially filled up during the year.

Proof Positive.

"Yes," she said, I shall marry Harold, for I know he loves me."

"How?"

"He watched me sharpen a pencil and didn't laugh."—Washington Star.

Mr. R. D. Wheeler, the popular deputy sheriff at Winooski Falls, Vt., says: "I suffered terrible tortures for 10 years with sciatic rheumatism. I began taking Hood's Sarsaparilla Since taking it I don't have any pain and can get around all right. [illegible]

What Hon. Samuel W. Allerton Thinks of Them.

The Hon. Samuel W. Allerton, the noted capitalist of Chicago, arrived over the Burlington Route a few days since, and during an interview with a Star reporter said: "You people do not begin to realize what you have here in these waters. I have had the opportunity of traveling some over the United States, and have visited a great number of health resorts with springs which are claimed to have medicinal properties, but in my opinion you have water here that is superior to anything in this whole country, if not in the world, for the cure of rheumatic afflictions and diseases of the skin. My attention was first called to these springs by an intimate friend, Mr. Spencer, who owns a large cattle ranch west of here. He had a man on his ranch that was so badly afflicted with rheumatism that he was hauled here in a helpless condition. He was bathed in the old Indian bath for several weeks, and he went home entirely cured up, and I resolved that if ever I had rheumatism in my family I would try Hot Springs, S. D. We brought Mrs. Allerton here as soon as she was able to come at all, and I have found that all Mr. Spencer said in reference to the curative properties of the waters has been realized in my wife's case. She said she feels as though she had just been turned loose from a prison where she had been called upon to endure excruciating torture—every joint and muscle racked with pain so that life was a burden. No, I think Hot Springs' future is a grand one. Its air is pure and wholesome, its scenery lively and inspiring; sleep comes without any effort and it is just the place for rest and building up a shattered constitution. You do not talk enough about the value of your waters for skin troubles. I, myself, received great benefit from them last year in a short visit there. Your climate makes you infinitely superior to the Arkansas Hot Springs, and in a country where so many thousands are afflicted with rheumatism and other kindred ailments, if your advantages are made known, there is no question but that you will become the foremost health resort in the United states. We are delighted with our trip here and what your waters have done for us and will make frequent visits to your pleasant little city.—Hot Springs, S. D. Star.

WATERLOO.

Mrs. Reed is no better.

Miss Ada Beck is in very poor health and is not benefited by any advice or medicine as yet.

Mrs. Ida Daniels of Fairmount, Minn., arrived in Waterloo Thursday of last week in response to a telegram from her sister, telling of their mother's serious illness. Mrs. Blair, at the present time, is much better.

Sunday evening the tolling bell announced the death of Joseph Miser, who, with his wife, has been quite feeble for a long time. The funeral took place Monday afternoon. Mr, Miser was one of the old landmarks and it is sad to see them passing away one by one.

Monday morning of last week, Rev. Richard Earle Locke passed through Waterloo, from Chicago, on his way to Boston. He visited his father's family and other friends at the commencement of his vacation when he first came west; later, he, with his brother Dell Locke, of Decatur, visited the fair at Chicago, remaining until last week. He has become a Congregationalist since living in the east and preaches regularly in the Old Colony Chapel in Boston.

Sunday was children's day at the Presbyterian church The children's meeting in the evening had been carefully prepared for and was very interesting. Not only was the audience room completely filled, but the hall and the windows also, the latter reached up to, in some way, from the outside. The church was very tastefully decorated with flowers, vines and growing plants, as well as flags, banners, etc. The chancel, in front of the desk, the windows, and indeed every available place was made beautiful. The children were helpers throughout and showed their interest in a commendable way. Three girls bought and made a pretty and suitable dress and gave to one of their classmates whose circumstances prevented her appearing as well clad as the others, thus showing a kind feeling and good heart. No doubt the evening was doubly enjoyed by these kind, thoughtful girls who had made another happy. God always blesses kind acts.

Eugene Carter and wife, of Paris, France, came over a few weeks ago. After visiting his sister, Mrs. Donzor, and mother at Lima for three weeks, Mr and Mrs. Carter, with Mrs. Carter, senior, came to Waterloo last week where Mrs. Eugene C. is now visiting the Lockes. Eugene accompanied his mother to Chicago where she goes to spend some time with a friend. Eugene, after taking in the fair, returns to Waterloo this week. Mr Carter and wife brought many expensive and lovely gifts to the relatives here that the average woman could hardly see without glistening eyes, and possibly the least bit of covetousness. Elegant dresses, wraps, silk stockings, checked, fine and soft as spider webs; dainty gloves by the half dozen pair, napkins by the dozen, exquisite in quality, pattern and finish, such as are rarely seen in this country; summer shawls, like a mist with gold or silver threads glinting here and there. Mr. Carter and wife with the mother, if sufficiently well, will cross the ocean to their home in September.

BUTLER.

Health in town and vicinity is exceedingly good.

Harvest has commenced and we have a very fine wheat harvest to gather—corn and potatoes need rain.

T. C. Fralick has moved back to Butler from Detroit. He has secured employment in the bicycle factory.

New cement walks are being put down in front of the Inman place, the Record office and the Haverstock block on Broadway.

The net receipts of the Butler postoffice dropped off $19 for the quarter ending July 1, as compared with the same quarter of '92, not much change in Butler after all its removals.

Gus Wolf will empty his south room of groceries and put in a line of clothing. This will be a little more in keeping with his lifetime work. Still he has become quite a proficient grocer.

A number of our empty houses are being occupied by the brick manufacturers. When they get started and run a full force of about seventy-five men, we will be under the necessity of building some more residences. The enterprise promises much for Butler.

Mrs James Gaff living two miles east of Butler, had the misfortune to break one of the bones of her right leg, by stepping off a bridge at her barn door, when she was driving a horse to unload hay. She is suffering very severely, and the parts are too much swollen to admit of admit of replacement.

CONCORD.

Will Smurr has the boss corn field.

This week the farmers will cut the golden grain.

Children's meeting at Fairview, last Sunday evening.

THE VOYAGE HOME

Sailing the Summer Seas o'er or Kissing of the Salt Sea Waves.

EDITOR OF COURIER: As many of your readers have never sailed over the briny deep, a detailed account of our late adventures on the tropic seas will perhaps interest the inhabitants of this interior land. The Caribbean Sea is one of the calmest waters on earth In fact its very calmness was the cause of the adventures which I will now relate. The natives who live upon the shores of this sea have grown bold in navigating these peaceful waters. In a canoe dug from one log, they will sail far out of sight of land, frequently making trips of several hundred miles in their frail craft, seldom meeting with disaster. Many good ships call at our port, but we preferred sailing in a Carib craft, as we thereby would see more of the country along the shore as we coasted to the westward. It was on a beautiful Sunday morning in the month of May that we bid adieu to our friends at the village of Duke of Macho, which has been the scene of our operations for the past season. Our little craft was twenty feet in length, with a beam of eight feet, made from one solid log of mahogony. Our crew consisted of four native Caribs, one of whom was the owner of the boat, Of passengers there were four; one was a colored laborer from New Orleans, named Charles Brown; a Mr. Van. Sickler, a drygoods merchant of Fort Scott, Kansas; Mr. E. A. Dunning of Port Burchard and myself. We had on board a plentiful supply of provisions and twenty-five large watermelons, and all of our baggage including two large trunks filled with curiosities which I spent some weeks in collecting. A merry crowd were we as we went sailing over the deep green sea, wafted onward by a gentle breeze that always blows from the northeast in that latitude. Pleasantly we sped on over the sparkling waters till night came on, when all except the crew were wrapped in peaceful slumber, with the bright stars for a mantle and the arched canopy of ethereal blue for a protection. Sweet were our dreams and refreshing was our sleep until morning dawned when we found ourselves some eighty miles to the westward, and directly opposite the old but beautiful town of Truxillo. With a good harbor and verdure clothed mountains for a background, this town has a location that is the envy of her neighbors. Long stretches of coral formation extend far out to sea, and it was over one of these entrancingly beautiful beds of coral we were floating as the morning calm rested us on the bosom of the sea. Not more than twenty feet beneath us were thousands of miniature trees of exquisite beauty; egg shaped cones and silk like forms of coral of a thousand varigated lines. Never in my life have I seen so beautiful a panorama as that presented to us from beneath the surface of the crystal brine. At nine o'clock the usual sea breeze sprung up, and onward to the west all day long we sailed by a bold and rocky shore. Until the golden orb of day sank beneath the watery waste all things promised a speedy and prosperous voyage. The short twilight of the tropics soon over, we once more prepared to rest for the night. As darkness crept over the sea, dark ominous looking clouds came crowding down from the mountains and overspreading the entire sky, filling the air with intense darkness—darkness so complete that we could see nothing of our shipmates. When we last saw the land we were about six miles off shore with no other sail in sight. The breeze died down and a dead stillness reigned over the black waters. The Caribs were humming a native song in the Carib tongue. Mr. Van Sickler had retired to sleep beneath the little deck in the after part of the boat; Gene was trying to slumber on a seat; Charlie, our colored friend was uneasy and restless and seemed to be filled with deep forebodings of impending danger. Indeed all day long he kept telling us that his heart was up in his throat, and now he sat silently watching the black clouds overhead Although I had sailed many thousand miles over stormy seas and knew no fear; I felt this night a sort of sullen dread that would not let me sleep, The hours passed away and the blackness seemed to be intensified, when about eleven o'clock a bright flash of electric light enveloped the distant mountain tops, and a loud peal of thunder warned us of an approaching squall. I gave the Caribs orders to take down all sails but they gave no heed, only continued their strong guttural song A few minutes more and I could then hear the unwelcome roar of the approaching storm. Nearer and nearer it came, then came the first puff of wind which aroused the lazy Caribs to action. They now attempted to take down the sails, but too late; a harder gust, a dash of big drops, a crash of a thunderbolt kissing the black waters and our frail craft went reeling over on her side, filled with water and all the cargo went drifting no one knew whither. Everyone on board except myself was thrown into the waves. As the vessel turned bottom side up I kept on top, clutching onto the wreck. Mr. Van Sickler awoke to find himself struggling in the waves. But how it all came about I cannot tell but we soon found that all hands were clinging bravely to the hull. It was only when the lightning would flash that we were able to see each other No one had as yet spoken a word, each being too intensely interested in self, just then, to make conversation agreeable. Money, clothing, curiosities, etc., were of no value then, life being the only property worth saving, and for a time it seemed extremely doubtful if any of us would ever tread the solid earth again Our chances seemed about ten to one in favor of drowning. The rain came down in torrents and never did water seem quite so cold, every drop feeling like an icycle as it fell relentlessly on our unprotected backs, we having on no coats, only thin pants and shirts. Our lower extremities were in the sea which was warm, but the cold shower beat upon our uncovered heads and shoulders and a horrible chill took possession of our bodies. Above the murmur of the waters I heard Mr. Van Sickler shiveringly remark that he could not hold on much longer, and Gene said that he was about gone too. Although I was convulsed with chills, I had abundant strength to hold on to the wreck, and feeling about in the floating wreckage, I hauled off some garments which I gave to Mr. Van Sickler and Gene to protect themselves from the cold rain, which gave them sufficient warmth to hold on a while longer. Our colored friend, Charlie, entreatingly patting me on the shoulder asked, "what will we do now?" I could not outline the program before us but thought best to try to get to shore. If the shore should be rocky and the breakers bad we would surely stand but a slight chance of reaching shore alive. To us this was an unknown coast, but the attempt must be made. The Caribs had now so far recovered their senses as to remove the masts, and all getting on one side, we all heaved together and righted the craft which now barely floated, the waves rolling over it. We all climbed inside and with paddles, poles and sticks we pulled for the distant shore. The water logged wreck made but poor headway, it being very difficult to guide, It was only when the lightning flashed that we could see the distant mountain tops and take our bearings. For six long hours we pulled for the shore with all our might and main, until at last we could hear the breakers pounding on the beach and throwing up their long rows of phosphorescent light, and a new terror awaited us. "Could we swim the breakers?" was the question that now agitated us. I determined to make a desperate effort to save my white comrade, so tying a cord around Mr. Van Sickler's waist I took the other end in my teeth and awaited with dread the now fast approaching breakers. We had followed Charlie's example and had now allowed our hearts to come up in our throats, as it were. A moment of terrible anxiety! The first white wreathes of foam were upon us and with a heavy thud the keel struck the ground. I leaped out into the water and found that between the waves my head was out, and now for the shore! A wild scramble and soon we were all upon the firm pebbly beach. Saved.

You will remember the condition I was in five years ago, when I was afflicted with a combination of diseases, and thought there was NO HELP FOR ME. I tried all kinds of medicines, and scores of eminent physicians. My nerves were prostrated, producing dizziness, heart trouble and all the ills that make life miserable. I commenced to take and in three months I WAS PERFECTLY CURED. In my travels each year, when I see the thousands of physical wrecks, suffering from nervous prostration, taking prescriptions from local physicians who have no knowledge of their case, and whose death is certain, I feel like going to them and saying, "GET DR. MILES' NERVINE AND BE CURED." In my profession, where there are so many sufferers from overwork, mental prostration and nervous exhaustion, brought on by the character of the business engaged in, I would recommend 'MILES' NERVINE" as a sure cure for all suffering from these causes.

An Explanation.

MR. EDITOR: An article in a recent issue of your paper, from the pen of Mr. Becker, of Akron, O., touching Judge Tafft's opinion in the Fairview U. B. church case, needs an additional word of explanation in order to cut off its deceptive influence and purpose. I ask not for space to review his article in detail. All persons interested will understand a more brief statement. It is well known that this case was heard upon demurrer and not upon its merits. Now, when a party prepares a case involving large interests, for a hearing in the court, it is to be expected that they will try to make their case strong as possible. The Radicals did so in the case above named, even beating their former record for extravagant statements, unwarrantable allegations and foundationless claims. The quotations from Judge Taft's opinion, as given by Mr. Becker, serve his purpose well, but he failed to give one which signifies everything for the Liberals and points to certain defeat of the Radicals, when the case shall be tried upon its merits. In the close of his decision, Judge Taft says: "It should be distinctly understood that this ruling is upon the averments exactly as they are." These averments are substantially the same as those made in former cases, not one of which has been decided in favor of the Radicals, so that in the trial of this case, it remains for us simply to prove, as we have in many other instances, that the statements in the bill are false, and that the claims of the Radicals are without foundation, and thus make the way clear for a reversal of this ruling.

AUBURN AND VICINITY.

Some Reminiscences of its Early Days and Pioneer Citizens.

1871—Continued.

The disciples of temperance of later years have withdrawn from local and practical work and entered the domain of politics under the name prohibition where they are harmless to the retailer of liquors; but twenty or more years ago, the supreme thought of temperance people was local suppression and with this end in view, a county temperance convention attended by a large number of the friends of temperance from different parts of the county met, on Feb. 22nd in the M. E. church of Auburn and effected an organization by electing G. McFarland, president; Lewis Holbrook vice-president and D. D. Moody, secretary.

On motion of John P. Widney, a committee on resolutions was appointed and also an executive committee of one from each township named as follows:

Samuel Cornell, Solomon Barney, Sol. DeLong, Wm. Wannamaker, P. B. Nimmons, Michael Long sr., S. Bassett, Wm. Parks, James Graham, Williard Childs, Edward Barker, Henry Jones and Andrew Casebeer.

This committee perfected the temperance organization on April 4, at a meeting held in the law office of Messrs. Moody & Peterson of Auburn and, in the belief that "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure," they proclaimed the end they had in view was: "The redemption of humanity from the curse of intemperance."

They were in earnest and their aggressive campaign for a time bore down all opposition and Auburn became a temperance town. It was said that trade followed the venders of liquor and without a saloon, Auburn would become a dead place, but the quiet was the peacefulness of sobriety and workmen's wages in a building and loan association were used to buy lots and erect upon them good homes.

Opportunely for the good of the town, Thomas C. Mays previously connected with the Ft. Wayne Sentinel bought of J. A. Barns, the Air Line, then published at Waterloo and removed the press and material to Auburn and commenced the publication of the AUBURN COURIER. On Jan. 5th, 1871 the first number appeared as an eight-column folio. In the latter part of '72, it became a six-column quarto and later changed to a seven-column quarto its present size.

Mr. Mays was well qualified for editorial work; he was the man for the time and place; soon attracted and held a large circulation by no means confined to party; and by his vigorous and straight forward editorials did much to awaken the townspeople to their opportunities and to attract people from other places to the county seat.

His introductory promises, to try to harmonize all by introducing a spirit of active co-operation with a good will and enterprise to make us a happy and a prosperous people; and to place our county, with its ample agricultural, machanical and commercial resources among the first in the state, were faithfully carried out.

A practical printer, a good writer and of genial disposition, he was at once favored by good advertising patronage and as an auspicious promise of official favor, was the recipient of an extraordinary delinquent list numbering fully 800 descriptions for publication at very remunerative rates.

Mrs. Mays was a lady of excellent society as well as home accomplishments, was a familiar figure in the choir of the M. E. church, being a fine singer and none will recall her but with pleasurable thoughts.

On July 1, '78. Mays sold the COURIER to Theodore Reed of Columbia City; shortly after he went west, published a paper at Hot Springs, Arkansas, about 1881, and having been more or less in newspaper work since leaving Auburn, is at present state printer at Little Rock, Ark., though owning a half interest in a newspaper, the "Press," at Paragould in the same state.

Meanwhile the COURIER was edited by Mr. Reed in the rooms in the Odd Fellows block, now occupied by the Auburn Dispatch. He was a man of recognized ability, and his management was fairly successful resulting in a constant beneficial influence upon the welfare of the town.

Robert J. Lowry son of the congressman, soon purchased an interest and the firm of Reed & Lowry existed until the spring of 1880, when Reed sold to Lowry who became sole owner while Reed obtained employment with the Northern Pacific people and is a resident of Spokane Falls, Washington.

Soon after acquiring the COURIER, Mr. Lowry died and in December, 1880, J. A. Barnes forming a partnership with D. Y. Husselman bought the paper and continued its publication. The office was at once removed to the second story of the Kiblinger block, Main st., where it now is. Mr. Husselman was a lawyer, later clerk of this county and at present is engaged in a manufacturing business, the Eagle Iron Works, at Auburn Junction. Health failing, on Jan. 1, 1882, he retired from the firm and was succeeded by F. P. Blair, son of L. J. Blair, of Waterloo. In March following, Mr. Barns acquired his interest by purchase and as sole proprietor and editor has conducted the COURIER to the present time.

In 1884, he replaced the old Washington hand press by a Campbell power press and soon after added steam power. At intervals since, he has supplied much needed material and made the COURIER establishment a first-class country office.

The subscription list from the start encouraging, has steadily increased and is fully sixty per cent greater than when Mr. Barns took the office. The COURIER and its publisher are too well known to require fur her mention in this connection.

BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG.

When in Chicago during the World's Fair, we would advise our readers not to fail to see one of the grandest sights of that city, the vast and realistic panorama of the BATTLE OF GETTYSBURG, which is exhibited on the corner of Wabash Av. and Panorama Place. Those who have never witnessed a work of the kind can form no conception of the startling effects that are obtained. The Gettysburg Panorama is the work of Paul Phillipoteaux, a French artist of great ability and established reputation as a military painter whose wonderful "Defense of Paris" has been seen by most Americans who have visited the French capital. Mr. Phillipoteaux has made striking success, where ordinary scenic painters have failed. It is his idea to complete the pictorial illusion by placing the spectator in the center of the scene, and completely surrounding him with a broad circumference of earth and sky. The whole battlefield of Gettysburg is reproduced with strictest topographical accuracy, and the details of the great fight are represented with a realism that seems marvelous. The foreground is actually built out with real fences, earth, trees, guns, etc., which are so skillfully led up to and joined with the painted canvas, which is 50 feet high and 475 feet in circumference that it is almost impossible to discover where reality ends and illusion begins. A descriptive lecture is given by a veteran of the war. The enthusiasm of the old soldier, "and there thousands of them" who gaze upon this panorama, is unbounded. A band of Dakota Indians who were taken to see it, paid an altogether too sincere tribute to the potency of the illusion. Fully convinced that the scene was real, they became wildly excited and wanted to rush down upon the broad field and take a hand in the fight. The amphitheatre rang with their war whoops, a panic ensued, and it was with only by getting the dusky warriors outside of the building that calm was restored.

Gilbert-Altenberg.

So many of our people are acquainted with Cosper Altenberg, that we copy from a Little Rock Democrat of July 12, the following notice of the marriage of his daughter:

At noon today Miss Mamie Altenberg, eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Cosper Altenberg, was married to Mr. David B. Gilbert, of Murray, Ky., at the residence of her parents on Cumberland street. The interior of the house was beautifully decorated with flowers and English ivy. The guests were intimate friends of the family and bride.

Just at noon the bridal party entered the parlor to the strains of the wedding march played on the piano by Prof. Albert Wiley. They were preceded by Rev. G. L. Schaffer, pastor of the Main street Methodist church, who passed in the center of the room in front of the couple, propounded the usual questions, and when the affirmative response was given by each, pronounced them husband and wife. The ceremony was brief yet impressive.

The bride looked charming. She wore a traveling dress of blue and tan gloria silk, made with pointed bodice and puffed sleeves and bell shaped skirt. Her hair was becomingly arranged. In her hand she carried a white lily, tied with a narrow band of white satin ribbon. She is only a few months beyond twenty years old. Born in this city, she has passed all her life here, growing up from childhood to womanhood under the influences of as tender care as were ever bestowed on a child. She is well educated and refined, and in her disposition and character are combined all the qualities that ennoble and beautify womanhood. No girl has possibly ever left her native place as a bride, carrying with her more genuine and heart-felt wishes for a happy future than Mamie J. Altenberg.

Mr. D. B. Gilbert is worthy of the bride he has won. He is a member of an old and honorable Kentucky family; and although he is only 23 years old, he has developed rare business qualifications. He is a member of the firm of Gilbert, Son & Co., tobacconists, of Murray, Ky. His future is most promising.

The bride received a large number of elegant presents, including all kinds of silverware and bric-a-brac.

An elegant wedding breakfast was served, the tables being decorated with flowers and the menu comprising every imaginable delicacy.

Mr. and Mrs. Gilbert left on the Memphis train this afternoon for Murray, Ky., their future home.

FOLLOWED TO DEATH.

A MOTHER AND HER CHILDREN DROWNED.

A Bolt of Lightning Kills a Family—Smothered to Death in a Wheat Bin—Killed at a Crossing—Shot His Mother—Broke His Jaw.

SAD DROWNING.

Mother and Two Children Go Down to a Watery Grave.

Mt. Vernon (Ind.) special: The saddest accident that ever happened in this city was the drowning of Mrs. A. J. Alles and her two children, Willie aged 4, and Annie, aged 6. Mill Creek runs through the center of Mt. Vernon and is a very quiet stream. Recently, however, a heavy rain fell, and as the stream is the natural outlet to the Ohio River of about ten miles of country, the usually placid creek was converted into a raging torrent.

Willie Alles, Willie Boyce, and several other small boys were playing on its banks, when in some unknown manner Alles fell into the water. His cries attracted his mother from her house near by, and with great haste she hurried to the bank, and on seeing her child struggling in the water she rushed into the creek, which was about five feet deep. Her daughter Annie, on seeing her mother go into the stream, caught hold of her dress and followed her. The strong current threw Mrs. Alles off her feet, and before assistance could be rendered all three were drowned and their bodies swept by the strong stream into the river.

The Boyce boy, it is thought, also fell into the stream and was drowned. His hat was found in the creek, but no trace has been discovered of him. The news spread rapidly, and soon great crowds were on the scene looking for the bodies. After an hour's dredging the body of William Alles was found, but as yet none of the others have been recovered.

Dead Man's Crossing.

Mr. Dennis Carroll, a citizen of Xenia, Ohio, who owns a farm a few miles north of town, in company with a colored farm-hand, Charles Gillis, attempted to cross the Springfield branch of the Little Miami Railroad, three miles north of Xenia, when they were run into by a south-bound freight train. The wagon in which they were seated was torn to pieces. Gillis was thrown onto the track and ground to pieces in a horrible manner. His body was cut in two at the chest and mangled beyond recognition. Mr. Carroll was injured badly, though not fatally, about the head and back.

Shot Him Dead.

At Cambridge City, Ind., Mrs. Jennie Boone shot and instantly killed Mark Rears, who, either by mistake or intention, attempted to enter her house. She used a 38-calibre revolver, and the ball pierced his heart, he falling dead in his tracks. Rumors of all kinds are afloat, and the people at Cambridge City are much excited. Rears was a man of prominence, known all over the county, and Mrs. Boone is a well-known woman.

Smothered to Death Beneath Wheat.

While Eddie Cornwall and Charlie Cochrane, both aged 12, were playing in wheat-bins at the elevator at Bourbon, Ind., wheat was drawn from the bin, and Cornwall was sucked in and smothered to death. Cochrane succeeded in getting hold of a beam, but Cornwall was too far from the side of the bin. He was about fifteen feet under, and took workmen one hour to dig him out.

Pittsburgh Gets a Saengerfest.

At a meeting of the North American Sængerbund held at Cleveland, steps were taken to affect a permanent organization. A committee of twenty will be named by the President, Paul Schneider, to formulate a constitution and by-laws for the government of the organization. It was decided to hold the next sængerferfest at Pittsburgh.

A Cyclone Strikes Leipsic, Ohio.

Lima (O.) special: A cyclone passed over Leipsic, a town north of this city. A number of dwellings were leveled. It is impossible to learn further particulars or a list of the killed or wounded. The cyclone did great damage in the country, but its main force was spent in the village.

Shot His Mother.

Mrs. Baighle, residing near Tontogany, Ohio, went to awaken her son George, aged 20 years, by throwing a cup of water in his face. He arose suddenly, and seizing a shotgun, fired it at her, the shot taking effect in her arm and side. Her recovery is doubtful.

A Bolt Kills a Family.

During a storm the house of Henry Washington, a respectable colored man, living about two miles from Gwinys, Va., was struck by lightning, killing him, his daughter, and a niece instantly. A son, who was in the same room, escaped uninjured.

It Struck Oil.

Lightning struck a 35,000-barrel oil tank belonging to the Buckeye Pipe Line Company, and located near Welker, Ohio. The tank was full of oil, and slowly burned to the ground. Loss, $15,000.

Situation Improved.

There is general concurrence among the officials of the Treasury Department that the financial situation has improved and continues to improve.

Bishop Dwenger's Successor.

Cincinnati special: A dispatch received in this city from an authoritative source in Rome states that Bishop Rademacher, now of the diocese of Tennessee, with his episcopal residence at Nashville, will in a few days be appointed to succeed the late Bishop Dwenger of the diocese of Fort Wayne, Ind., who died some time ago. The Fort Wayne diocese includes all of Northern Indiana, enumerating several large Catholic schools and universities, among others being the University of Notre Dame at South Bend. The dispatch states that Bishop Rademacher will enter upon his duties August 1. Mgr. Satolli will be present in Fort Wayne at the installation services.

EVERYBODY SICK.

Hundreds of Persons Poisoned at Mansfield, Ohio.

Mansfield (Ohio) special: Physicians are dealing with a wholesale case of poisoning. In all twenty-five families are sick, ten persons at the point of death, the result of eating cheese made by a local cheese company and sold by grocerymen. The victims suffer intensely. Physicians differ as to the cause, two claiming it is the result of contaminated well water.

The following names of families and the number given were poisoned:

Fred Ackerman, five persons.
William Bient, five persons.
William Both, two persons.
John Cross, six persons.
George Cunningham, six persons.
Henry Faust, four persons.
George Fickel, seven persons.
John Fisher, nine persons.
John Glack, three persons.
Charles Hans, four persons.
Frank Hess, three persons.
E. Kelser, five persons.
H. Ruess, four persons.
J. W. Stewart, three persons.
George Wetherby, two persons.
Paul Wingert, eleven persons.

One hundred and ten persons sampled the cheese, which was manufactured near the city. Nine doctors, together with the coroner, are in charge of the afflicted, and although no deaths are yet reported, several persons are expected to die hourly.

Health Officer Reed has procured two pounds of the cheese and sent it to the health department at Columbus for analysis.

SIX OR SEVEN KILLED

And Fifteen or Twenty Were Severely Injured.

Newburgh (N. J.) special: West Shore day express, No. 1 was wrecked in the West Shore yard in the southern part of the city. Six or seven persons were killed and fifteen or twenty injured. Two of the dead had each an arm torn out. The train consisted of engine No. 200, run by Shelby, engineer, baggage car, three day coaches and a Wagner car. The train was well filled with passengers. Car No. 71, in which nearly all the casualties occurred, had every seat filled. The train was a few minutes late at Cornwall and the distance from that place to the southern limit of Newburgh came at a very rapid rate. It crossed Quassic Creek, a mile south of the station, ran a few rods further, under the Pennsylvania Coal Company's bridge, then ran into an open switch into the West Shore yard. In that yard a train was standing ready to pull out on the main track. The day express engine struck the freight engine with terrible force. The engineer jumped, but a little late and was slightly hurt. The fireman also jumped and escaped injuries. The train crashed through the freight and all the passenger cars were more or less smashed. Day coach No. 71, following the sleeper, had its side torn off and the truck torn out. The scene in this car was terrible. Several persons were killed outright and nearly all the rest were more or less injured.

IN ASHES.

An Indiana Town Almost Destroyed by Fire.

A destructive fire occurred at Princeton, Ind. The Methodist and Presbyterian churches, BaMers Hotel, Farmers' Bank, and Mayor Zoller's residence were entirely consumed. The following business houses were burned: Rollin & Branham, hardware; Smith & Lucas, chinaware; W. D. Dowdy & Co., dry goods; the Light newspaper and printing office; V. S. Beasley, drugs; Dimick Leamis & Co., dry goods; Piney & Woods, drugs; C. Brown & Co., dry goods; Ager Bros., general store; Lowe & Skull, furniture; Joyce & Co., livery stable; Snapp & Tichner's carriage factory.

The loss is estimated at $250,000 with insurance amounting to $150,000. But one life is reported lost at this writing. The body of a man was found but not recognized. Many were overcome by the heat but no deaths reported. Had it not been for the Evansville Fire Department the entire city would have been destroyed. Electric light wires are all down leaving the city in total darkness.

AGAINST THEIR WILL.

The National Commissioners Denounce Sunday Opening.

Chicago special: The National Commission, by a vote of 44 to 6, declared that the Sunday closing rule adopted by the commission and directory is the real rule that ought to be enforced, and that the Sunday opening rule being enforced was without the sanction of the commission.

The following resolution was adopted by the vote given above, which shows that the entire commission with the exception of six are in favor of closing on the Lord's day.

Resolved, By the World's Columbian Commission, that the rule now being enforced by the World's Columbian Exposition for the purpose of opening the gates of the exposition on the Sabbath day, is not approved or indorsed by this commission, is in violation of the rule jointly adopted and promulgated by said exposition and said commission, and is being enforced without the assent or authority of the World's Columbian Commission.

Crop Report.

The weather has been specially favorable for harvesting throughout the winter wheat belt. The corn crop is reported as much improved and in excellent condition in the principal corn-producing states.

Indiana—Wheat harvest ended in southern and central portions; oats ready to cut; corn and potatoes in good condition; rain needed.

Ohio—Fine growing weather; wheat, clover, and barley harvested over the middle and southern sections; wheat threshing in progress, quality good, oats turning fast, corn advancing rapidly, early potatoes matured.

Michigan—All crops have made vigorous growth; wheat about ready, corn and rye a good crop, oats light.

Nitroglycerine Explosion.

At Washington, D. C., William Cox, aged 12, his sister, Matilda, aged 14, and Georgia Ward, aged 12, found a pint and a quart bottle under a tree at the roadside. They threw several stones at the bottles. When one of the bottles was struck, an explosion followed that shook houses a mile away. A large hole was blown in the earth, trees and fences were thrown down and the children hurled many feet away. The bottles contained nitroglycerine. William Cox was fatally hurt. The girls were badly injured and are in a critical condition.

Luckey, Ohio, Burned.

Toledo special: The town of Luckey, in Wood County, Ohio, sixteen miles from this city, was visited by a destructive fire, only a blacksmith shop, two saloons, and a meat market being left standing. The flames first started in the general store of Myer Brothers and because of insufficient water supply could not be controlled. An engine and hose cart from this city went to the scene and succeeded in extinguishing the blaze after $100,000 damage had been done. The insurance will be about a third of that amount.

Cyclone's Work.

A cyclone struck Stillwater, Mich., and two men are dead and seven injured. The injured will recover in a few days. Immediately after the funnel-shaped cloud appeared it swept down upon the city covering a space fifty feet wide. The Stillwater brick yard buildings were demonished. In the path of the storm numerous buildings were blown down or carried from their foundations. The waters of the lake were carried high into the air. The storm cloud lifted just before it struck the Wisconsin shore and disappeared.

Fifteen-Round Fight at Jackson.

The fifteen-round glove contest at Jackson, Mich., between LaBlanche, the "Marine," and Bob Manning was stopped in the eighth round. In the third round Manning knocked the "Marine" under the ropes, but up to the seventh, aside from this, the men clinched most of the time. The last two rounds, however, became so hot that the police were satisfied that it was to be a knockout and interfered. Manning appeared to have a little the best of the fight at the close.

A Bad Wreck.

At Henryville, Ind., a special freight ran into the regular freight, causing a frightful collision. George Shirley and Brookbank, engineer and brakeman, were fatally hurt. A car load of horses from the race course at Columbus, among them Paulina, were mangled in the wreck. The attendants, Benjamin Wood and Douglas Wilks, are missing. A man named Rayburn of New Albany, in charge of another car of horses, was killed.

War Declared.

The London Times correspondent at Bangkok telegraphs that the Siamese Government has refused to permit two more French gunboats to enter the Meinam River, twenty miles from the mouth of which Bangkok is situated, and has threatened that if the gunboats attempt to cross the bar at the mouth of the river they will be sunk. France, the correspondent adds, has officially held that this action is practically a declaration of war.

Against America.

Ottawa (Ont.) special: Professor Macoun, sent by the Dominion Government to make a supplementary report on real life in the Behring Sea, has just returned from Paris, where his evidence was laid before the Court of Arbitration. Asked as to the general impression in Paris when he left, as to the decision of the tribunal, Professor Macoun said: "The general impression is that Great Britain will win the case."

A Comet Sighted.

Seattle (Wash.) special: A comet was visible in the northern sky the other night, some degrees below and three or four degrees to the west of the Polar star and near the top of the great bear. The comet was seen just before 11 o'clock. The course is downward and it is about fifteen degrees above the horizon. The tail is but a few degrees in length, although the nuclues is very bright.

Knights of Pythias Hurt.

A special passenger train bearing a delegation of Knights of Pythias to Vincennes, Ind., to attend a banquet ran into a caboose at the Evansville & Terre Haute yards and injured several knights, one of them fatally. The injured are: Albert James, Fort Branch, fatally hurt; Samuel Miller, Mt. Vernon; Henry Schell, Mt. Vernon; O. M. Lyncher, Princeton; Samuel Bert.

A $10,000 Fire at Oaktown, Ind.

Oaktown, Ind., was visited by fire, and for a time it looked as if it would be wiped off the earth. Schultz & Bond's block, Smith's carriage factory, Rush Bond's warehouse and C. Haughton's warehouse with contents were consumed. Total loss about $10,000, fully insured. Charles Piper and Albert Mundin were seriously burned while fighting the fire.

Nun Fatally Burned by Gasoline.

At the Richmond street branch of the convent of Notre Dame, Cincinnati, several of the nuns returning late from a picnic desired to prepare refreshments. One of them, Sister Octavia, lighted a gasoline stove and it exploded, burning her so that she cannot live.

Killed by the Frost.

In the northern part of Huntington County, Indiana, is a fourteen-acre field of corn that is entirely dead. It was killed clear to the ground by the frost on the morning of the Fourth.

Indiana Bankers Fail.

Buck & Toan, bankers and dealers in hardware, Plymouth, Ind., closed their doors and assigned to R. B. Oglesbee. They have been in business without change since 1858.

Woolen Mills Burned.

Schofield's woolen mills at Madison, Ind., was destroyed by fire. The building and stock is valued at $70,000, and the loss is probably $50,000. There is partial insurance.

SIGHTS IN A BIG TOWN

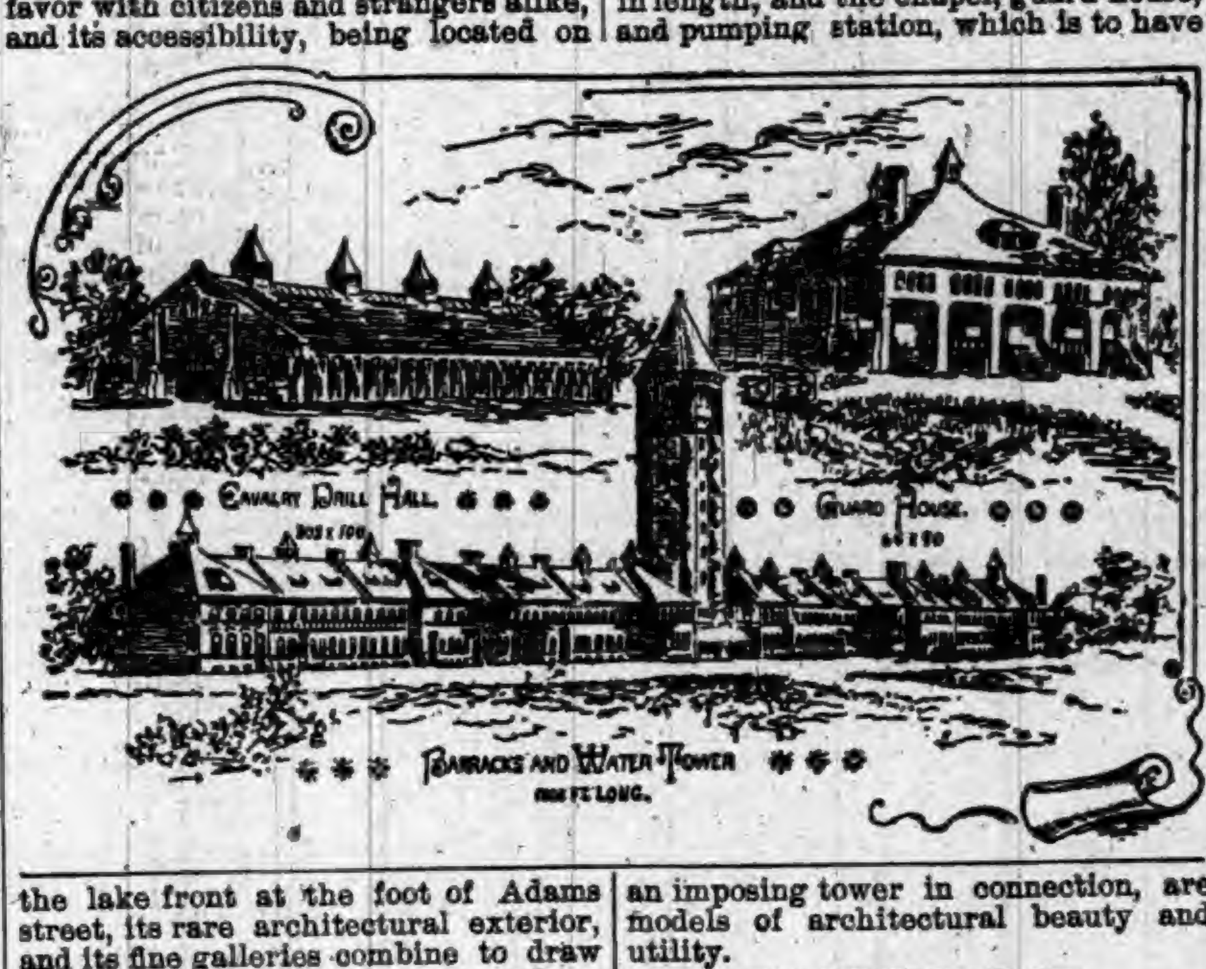
PLACES OF INTEREST TO THE CHICAGO VISITOR.

The Military Post at Fort Sheridan, the New Art Institute and the Life-Saving Station All Worthy a Visit from the Sight-Seer.

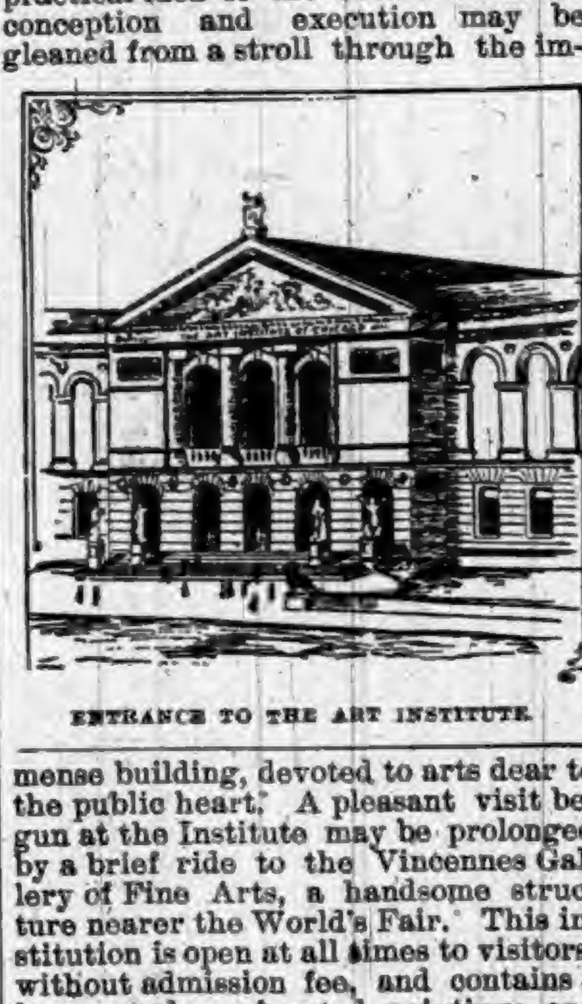
The World's Fair City.

Chicago correspondence:

The World's Fair visitor who has exhausted groups of attractions such as the parks, the theaters, the principal buildings and the like, need not look for other points of interest, considered minor only as their scope is confined to some particular line of art, science, or popular utility. Among such is, notably, the Art Institute of Chicago, and many hours, even a whole day, may be pleasantly and profitably spent under the roof of this great institution, which, scarcely completed, has thrown its doors open to all who love the beautiful in its most eloquent forms. It has become a spot of wide favor with citizens and strangers alike, and its accessibility, being located on the lake front at the foot of Adams street, its rare architectural exterior, and its fine galleries combine to draw a throng and gratify the senses and enlighten the intelligence.



Chicago counts a greater number of resident artists than any other metropolis in the West, according to the directory of 1892, and there are in the city numbers of very fine pictures. The Art Institute is a recent acquisition to the fraternity. The structure is the only building on the lake front as far south as the park extends, and occupies the original site of the Industrial Exposition. It is massive in appearance, and divided, as to interior, so as to carry out perfection in convenience in behalf of the students and the public. The average attendance of pupils is about four hundred. Its object is to maintain a school and museum of art, and the building will be found to contain a large and carefully selected collection of casts, sculpture, pictures, drawings, marbles and a library of works on fine art. There is abundant material for study, good models and life-like objects in profusion, and a practical idea of the details of art in conception and execution may be gleaned from a stroll through the immense building, devoted to arts dear to the public heart. A pleasant visit begun at the Institute may be prolonged by a brief ride to the Vincennes Gallery of Fine Arts, a handsome structure nearer the World's Fair. This institution is open at all times to visitors, without admission fee, and contains a large number of noted paintings and other works of art. The main gallery is claimed to be the finest west of New York. In a similar field, in a way, to both these institutions, is the Chicago Historical Society, temporarily occupying quarters at the corner of Dearborn avenue and Ontario street, precedent to the completion of its new magnificent home. Any person interested in local, State and national history may here observe relics connected with many notable events and persons of the past. The original collection of the society, including over 100,000 books, newspaper and manuscripts, was destroyed in the great fire of 1871, the original draft of the Lincoln emancipation proclamation being also lost, but the institution has partially recovered, and a vast aggregation of historic value is now on free exhibition, the paintings and Indian relics being particularly fine, and worthy of close and extended study.



ENTRANCE TO THE ART INSTITUTE.

Fort Sheridan.

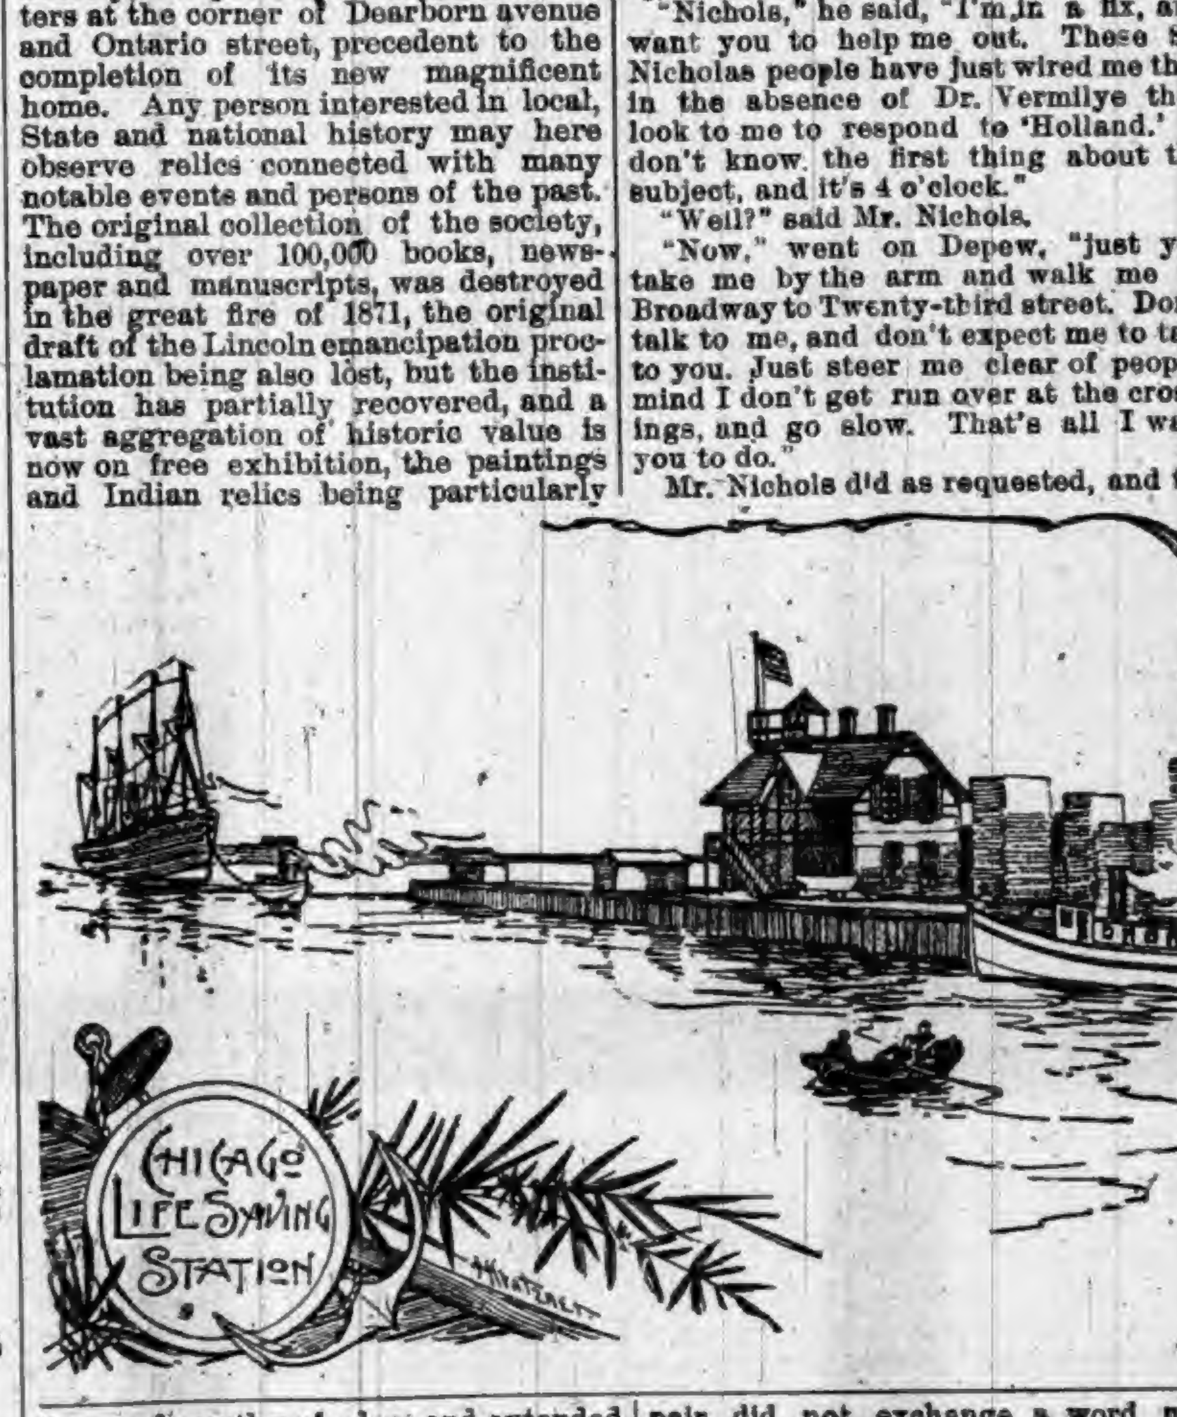
A most interesting point in the vicinity of Chicago is the new military post at Fort Sheridan, recently adopted and improved by the Government. To those who have only read of these homes of our regular soldiery, and are curious to see how they live, and to those as well who have visited other similar posts, Fort Sheridan will appeal strongly, for in beauty of situation, of grounds, and of buildings it has no equal in the United States, and no superior in the world. The extent and splendor of this post are augmented by the natural picturesqueness of the high bluffs lining the lake, which rise from the pebbly beach and break into ravines and gorges spanned by rustic bridges. The site was chosen because of the delightful and healthful location, and just past the grounds runs the celebrated Sheridan road, the great boulevard which, with its connecting highways, is the largest and broadest in the world, and which, when completed, will be eighteen miles in length, and dotted with palatial mansions and radiant gardens.

Fort Sheridan is located within less than an hour's ride from Chicago, on the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad. It contains many buildings, many soldiers and a large landed area. It is well worth the time devoted to inspect the quarters and paraphernalia of the camp, the evolutions of the soldiers being particularly interesting. The structures of the post are massive and of permanent stability. The barracks and water tower building is 1,005 feet in length, the armory mess hall 176 feet. There are five fine edifices, resembling private residences, and used as quarters for the field officers, captains, lieutenants, non-commissioned officers, and administration building. The cavalry drill hall and stables are, together, over 500 feet in length, and the chapel, guard-house, and pumping station, which is to have an imposing tower in connection, are models of architectural beauty and utility.

The Life-Saving Station.

The sight-seer on the way to Fort Sheridan or return may score a point in the way of pleasure and instruction by stopping off the train at Evanston, a suburb some ten miles north of Chicago. The model village of the section, Evanston is of itself worth being seen, with its palatial houses and magnificent university buildings, but it is also notable as being one of the principal life-saving stations along Lake Michigan. Those who wish to inspect the workings of the service nearer at home, however, may do so at the pier just beyond the Randolph street viaduct, where a similar life-saving crew is stationed. These men are a drilled, sturdy set of fellows, whose mission is fraught with peril and heroism, and the appearance of their home and environment is suggestive of many a famous nautical episode in history. The station includes buildings with a tower, from which with his fieldglass the lookout constantly scans the surface of the lake for any craft in distress. The finest lifeboats and every accessory are ready at hand—the rockets, the life-lines, baskets, beacons and the like, and, in the fiercest of storms, the crew sally forth to aid and rescue distressed mariners afloat.

A visit to this station of the service involves only a brief walk, taking in a splendid view of the lake and harbor. Strangers preferring to see the one at Evanston may go thither by boat for a small fee, the trip consuming a few hours, and enabling a view of the fine residence frontage on the lake shore drive, the crib, the water-works and Lincoln Park.



ONE OF DEPEW'S SPEECHES.

It Was Composed Amid the Rush and Roar of Broadway.

The death of Rev. Thomas Edward Vermilye, who for fifty years was Chaplain of the St. Nicholas Society, recalls an incident in which a well-known Brooklyn man and Chauncey M. Depew figured. Dr. Vermilye had for many years spoken to the toast "Holland" at the annual dinner of the organization named. Some eleven years ago, on the morning of the day set for the banquet, he was taken ill, and notified the dinner committee that he would be unable to make his wonted oration. At 4 o'clock on the same day Depew entered the office of John A. Nichols, of New York; wearing a worried expression and a perspiration-bedewed forehead.

"Nichols," he said, "I'm in a fix, and want you to help me out. These St. Nicholas people have just wired me that in the absence of Dr. Vermilye they look to me to respond to 'Holland.' I don't know the first thing about the subject, and it's 4 o'clock."

"Well?" said Mr. Nichols.

"Now," went on Depew, "just you take me by the arm and walk me up Broadway to Twenty-third street. Don't talk to me, and don't expect me to talk to you. Just steer me clear of people, mind I don't get run over at the crossings, and go slow. That's all I want you to do."

Mr. Nichols did as requested, and the pair did not exchange a word until Twenty-third street was reached at 5:15 p. m.

"Thankee," said Depew, as he parted with his friend; "I guess I'm all right."

At 7:30 p. m. the first thing that the eye of Mr. Nichols met as he sat down at the dinner-table was the bland, unruffled, smoothly shaven face of Depew. The speech that he made later is yet a delightful tradition in the annals of the St. Nicholas Society. It was chock full of wit, fact, figures and sentiment. Nobody but Mr. Nichols dreamed that it had been conceived, shaped, and born amid the riot and roar of Broadway.

Not Exactly Enoch Arden.

Twenty years ago Aaron Steinbach was a prominent farmer near Plymouth, Marshall County, this State. He owned a farm of fifty acres and had considerable cash deposited in the county-seat bank. About that time he decided to leave the farm and abandon his wife and two baby boys, but before he did that he deeded the farm to his wife and gave her $500 in cash. He was not heard from until the other day, when he appeared at the doors of the Home for Feeble-minded Youth in Fort Wayne. He stated that after he left Marshall County he went to Kansas and purchased a farm and there married a second wife. Years rolled on and the deserted Mrs. Steinbach married again. Her second husband was not thrifty, and squandered the farm, and she died a broken-hearted woman. The twin boys were sent to the Soldiers' Home at Knightstown, and afterwards transferred to the Feeble-minded Home. The boys always thought that both their parents were dead. The gray-haired man at the Feeble-minded Institute said that he was Aaron Steinbach, and the father of the 20-year-old twins, and he wanted to take them back to Kansas. The officers of the institution will release the boys as soon as they are assured of the identity of the old man.

THE TALE OF A HAT;

Or, Josh Merritt's Mania—Written for This Paper.

BY JULES VERNE.

CHAPTER IV.

The Chicago flyer was on time, but the great city of the prairies had no attraction for Josh Merritt. Not until the train rumbled across the magnificent bridge spanning the father of waters at St. Louis did the Englishman deign to make a few turns on the platform to get the kinks out of his long thin legs, and even this was but for a brief half hour. One after another Jefferson City, Sedalia and Fort Scott were left behind him, but not until the train pulled into Vinita and a band of Cherokees stalked beneath the car windows in sullen grandeur of buckskin leggins, red blankets and eagle plumes, did Gin-Ghi rub his eyes, give a smothered exclamation of horror and reach up to see if his pigtail was still there.

Now began weeks of patient search, weeks of wandering on horseback among the various reservations, from tribe to tribe, from Cherokees to Arapahoes, from Comanches to Chickasaws, from Creeks to Pottawatomies, from Sacs to Pawnees. Often and often, when a halt was made in some village, a chief wearing a silk hat stalked out to greet the silent Englishman, but that long, hard face, with its small, glassy eyes, was each time turned in vain upon the headgear of the noble red man as Gin-Ghi timidly handed him a plug of tobacco. It was not the hat that Prince Louis had given to Mr. Smith of Houston street.

Once, and once only, Mr. Joshua Merritt unsealed his mysterious lips, when an Indian agent expressed a hope that he might be successful in his search for the coveted treasure.

"Oh, yes, that's so," murmured the collector, as if speaking to himself; "that's so. I shall find it; I find everything I look for; yes, that's so; it's only a question of time; no doubt you have heard what I am looking for now?"

"Yes, sir," said the agent, "and I can hardly believe it, but you know more about these things than I do."

"Yes, that's so; that's so; you see, this hat is not like any other hat in the world."

"And hence you deem your collection incomplete without it?"

"Yes, that's so; that's so," came from Merritt slowly; and then he added, "and I'd give my head to get that hat on it."

"Is it a cocked hat, all gold lace?" inquired the agent, humoring this harmless monomaniac.

"Oh, no; but you must excuse me if I refuse to describe it. I must be wary—yes, that's so; there may be some competitor in the field, that's so; I must be wary, he might snap it up."

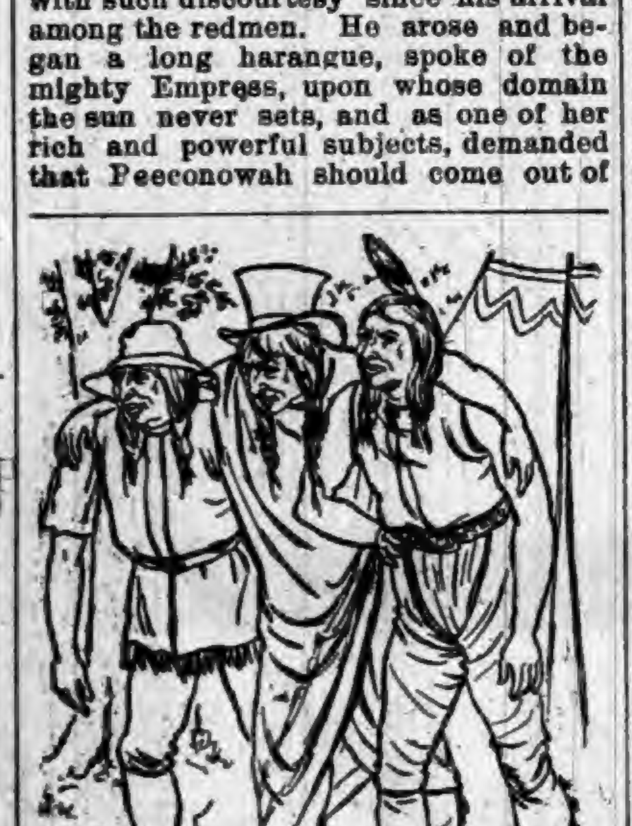
"No doubt you have some proof of its existence?"

"Oh, yes, that's so; that's so; $10,000 worth of proof—yes, that's so—twenty years' hard work, that's so—agents, correspondents, detectives, emissaries, that's so—but I'm on the track at last. I may find it on some chief's head—yes, that's so."

"But what tribe does he belong to?"

"Can't tell, that's so—can't tell—but if necessary I shall visit every one of them. I shall ransack every village—that's so—it must be here—that's so—that's so."

About the middle of the month, as Josh and Gin-Ghi—the former mounted on a tall, raw-boned, shaggy-maned, piebald horse, and the latter on an Indian pony as fat and sleek as himself—emerged from a deep gulch, through which they had been patiently toiling for six hours, they suddenly found themselves surrounded by a band of half intoxicated Indians, whose war paint and wild demeanor boded no good to the adventuresome pale-face and his yellow-skinned companion. They were Kickapoos, and in a state of violent agitation, for United States troops had lately driven them back from an attempted foray across the Mexican border. A number of them had been slain. As they formed a circle around the two lone travelers, executing a war dance and shrieking like howling dervishes, Gin-Ghi gave himself up for lost; but Joshua Merritt from his lofty perch looked down upon the dancing, howling, gesticulating band, with a mien so dignified, an expression so stolid and rigid, that the Indians fell back abashed, uttering their deep guttural "hows" with a respectful demeanor. The Englishman ordered Gin-Ghi to distribute tobacco. Not until he had made certain that his pigtail was still in place could the poor man recover his wits sufficiently to obey. And now, with a slow and windmill-like wave of his long arms, Merritt directed the Kickapoos to conduct him into the presence of their chief, Peeconowah, whose name was well known to the great collector. The village was reached in half an hour, and in solemn silence the bucks squatted around the two visitors. Pipes were produced and smoked, but still the chief of the Kickapoos came not. The Englishman began to grow uneasy. He had not been treated with such discourtesy since his arrival among the redmen. He arose and began a long harangue, spoke of the mighty Empress, upon whose domain the sun never sets, and as one of her rich and powerful subjects, demanded that Peeconowah should come out of his wigwam. The fact is, the chief was sleeping off a debauch and was not in a fit condition to meet his distinguished visitor. The sad failure of his attempted foray across the Mexican border had soured this noble red man and he had tasted deeply of the insidious firewater; but as the sun went down Peeconowah, leaning heavily upon two of his braves, made his appearance, wearing his army blanket in a very careless and undignified manner, while upon the back of his head an old-fashioned, broad-brimmed, bell-crowned silk hat seemed to be clinging desperately. As the chieftain took his place among his braves, the hat slipped off and rolled on the ground. Quick as a flash Merritt's long legs snapped him into an upright position, and picking up the hat he replaced it upon Peeconowah's head, with a respectful bow; but the keen observer would have noticed that as he did so he turned down the lining and glanced at it for an instant. It was the hat; the hat of all hats that Merritt's very soul was yearning for; the hat that he had searched for in every corner of the world. Upon the lining Merritt had read the words: "Prince Louis Napoleon to his friend, William Smith, New York, April 17, 1837."



"PEECONOWAH, LEANING HEAVILY UPON TWO OF HIS BRAVES."

Did Joshua Merritt give a wild yell of triumph? Did he kick his long legs high in the air? Did he draw out his wallet and spread crisp bank notes in Peeconowah's lap? No, none of these. He calmly turned to Gin-Ghi and commanded him to give the chief of the Kickapoos, Peeconowah, or "Old Fox Fond of His Hole," a plug of Sweet Virginia tobacco.

Joshua Merritt, Esq., of Liverpool, the famous collector, was a very astute judge of human nature, and as he sat there on the ground, with his gaze riveted upon the face of "Old Fox Fond of His Hole," he felt both instinctively and deliberately that the chief of the Kickapoos was no ordinary man, and the longer the Englishman studied the Indian's face the more uneasy did he become, until at last about three feet of cold shiver began to play up and down his back.

Rising slowly to his feet, Joshua walked to his horse, and, unstrapping a superb crimson blanket from his saddle, he threw it around Peeconowah's shoulders, and at the same time lifted the Napoleon hat from the chief's head and set it upon his own. It was a friendly exchange of gifts, but the chief was on his feet in an instant. Quickly unbuckling a richly embroidered belt, he clasped it around the Englishman's waist, and, reaching up, repossessed himself of the Napoleon hat, which he replaced on his head with a deep grunt of satisfaction. The cold shiver seemed to Joshua to gain three feet in length, but no human eye could have detected any trace of displeasure in that long, hard, yeoman face.

Merritt now began a series of experiments upon Peeconowah. Drawing forth a handsomely carved silver pocket flask, he unscrewed the top and passed it to the chief, who merely took a long smell at the contents, sighed, and then handed it back to the owner. Evidently he resented the attempt of the stranger to plunge him into another debauch. Joshua Merritt's hands were moist. Such a thing had not occurred in twenty years. But he determined to play another card before the pow-wow should be broken up. Walking up to his horse he unslung a superb rifle from his saddle. Peeconowah's eyes glistened as they fell upon the firearm. Placing it in the chief's hands he asked as a return gift that the great chief of the Kickapoos would honor him by settling the hat he wore upon his unworthy head. Peeconowah appeared to assent to the proposition, but suddenly withdrew to display the rifle to the females of his family. Merritt's heart came to a complete standstill. It was just so many seconds taken bodily out of his existence.

In a few moments Peeconowah reappeared, and with a grunt of satisfaction lifted the hat from his head and placed it on the Englishman's. Merritt made a start, and then his hand clutched at his revolver. He longed to send a bullet through the Indian's heart, for he had deceived him. It was not the Napoleon hat. "Old Fox Fond of His Hole" had changed the hat while in his wigwam. He had tricked the Englishman out of the superb firearm. Merritt could feel his hands turning cold. And yet any demonstration of feeling would be fatal. He smiled and in Indian fashion grunted out his thanks for the hat to Peeconowah, and then the pow-wow ended. Joshua Merritt was beaten, beaten at the very instant of triumph. Oh, it was bitter, very bitter. He felt like rushing into the chief's abode and shooting him down like a dog. True, his own death would be the inevitable consequence, but what would it matter? Would life be worth living without the Napoleon hat? Heaven forbid! Nor would it be of any avail to spread gold before the chief's eyes. His answer would be: "The great white chief at Washington supplies all my wants in winter, and in summer the hunting grounds are open to me!" Oh, it was terrible! When night came the Englishman threw himself upon his blanket with a groan that startled Gin-Ghi. All night long he tossed about in a raging fever, mumbling and muttering in his delirium. But the faithful and skillful Gin-Ghi knew how to administer such remedies that by daybreak his master fell into a refreshing sleep. Gin-Ghi had saved his life.

Joshua Merritt was not slow to reach a certain conclusion. It was this: There is but one way to get possession of the Napoleon hat, and that is to steal it. It might cost him his life, but he was firmly resolved to attempt it. Rather death a thousand times than go back home to Liverpool without the Napoleon hat. The great collector knew exactly where he was. He knew that he could not be far, not over thirty-five miles, from Fort Reno, on the North Fork of the Canadian River. He had a good horse, and so had Gin-Ghi. If they could get but half an hour's start of "Old Fox Fond of His Hole" they could reach Fort Reno, and once under the protection of the American flag, he could laugh at the charge of having stolen an old hat, should Peeconowah make it, and in any event the chief would be obliged to accept a few dollars in full payment of the damage done him. Gin-Ghi was now to be put to good service. He was to make friends with the children and squaws of the chief's family, and above all was to do as much sleeping as possible in Peeconowah's teepee. In this way they would become accustomed to his presence, and neither note his coming or going, little recking that the wily yellow-skinned Celestial was never wider awake in his life. The Englishman, for his part, was too busy himself riding about collecting medicine plants, and in order that there might be no delay he invariably saddled Gin-Ghi's pony and took him along, under pretense of needing the animal to carry the bundles of herbs which he tied to the saddle-bow. In a few days there was to be a hunt. The village would be quite deserted save by children and squaws. The plan worked to a charm. The real Napoleon hat was quietly replaced by the bogus one, and with the coveted bit of historic headgear pulled firmly down over his head, Joshua Merritt swung his long leg over the saddle and dashed out of the village. But his joy was destined to be short-lived, for scarcely had their horses warmed to their work when Gin-Ghi's quick ears caught the shrill whoop of the pursuing Kickapoos.

At first Joshua was inclined to pooh-pooh Gin-Ghi's assertion and to assure him that it was only the cry of a stray coyote. But it grew louder and louder. There was no mistaking it now. The Kickapoos were after them! However, as half of the distance to the fort had already been put behind them, there was a chance yet to reach it in safety.

"Ride, ride for your life, Gin-Ghi," yelled the long, gaunt Englishman, pulling the Napoleon hat down tighter over his head and lashing his horse furiously.

The little Indian pony had gone lame the day before, and although he made a gallant effort to follow the towering Rosinante bestridden by the tall Joshua like a wooden god, yet it was all in vain. The road suddenly roughened up and called for the surest of feet to avoid stumbling.

A shrill, long-drawn cry of fright and pain suddenly assailed Merritt's ears. Gin-Ghi had gone to the ground with his pony, and the infuriated Indians were in full sight. Although he would willingly have given his own life to land the Napoleon hat safe in his museum at Liverpool, yet Joshua Merritt was too good an Englishman to abandon a fellow-being in a moment of peril. He wheeled his horse about, and, swinging himself from his saddle, with two strides reached the fallen Chinaman. The Kickapoos, with murderous shrieks, came down upon them; but calmly and quietly, as if facing a troupe of stage Indians, he spread his long, strong legs over the prostrate Gin-Ghi, and, drawing his revolver, faced the howling band of Kickapoos with tight-set jaws.

In another instant a dozen bullets would have pierced his long body had not a protector sprang to his rescue. The black horse which brought this much needed help seemed to have leaped from one of the mountain gorges. To Merritt's amazement the rider was a woman wearing a blue cloth riding habit set off by narrow gold braid, and a black felt hat, from which a single black plume streamed gracefully. As she reined in her superb black beast, which she had thrown between the Englishman and the Indians, the latter fell back with a grunt of anger.

"Shame, Peeconowah," cried the lady, whom Joshua now for the first time recognized as Mrs. Hetty Waldron, "to make war on travelers in this way! How dare you attack a white man under the very shadow of Fort Reno, almost in my son's hearing?"

The chief gave a grunt of indignation.

"Dark lady"—so was Hetty called by the Indians—"this man has wronged Peeconowah," grumbled the chief. "He has stolen his hat," at which words there was a general outburst of grunts of indignation.

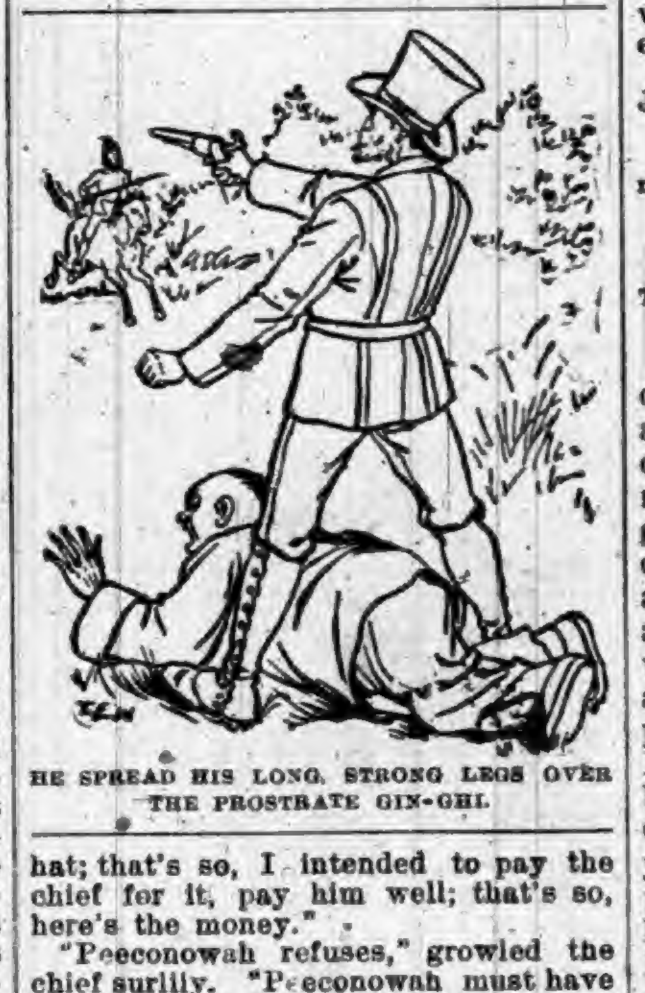
"Stolen your hat?" echoed Hetty in unfeigned amazement.

"Yes, dark lady," repeated the chief of the Kickapoos, "'tis even now upon his head."

Merritt drew forth a handful of gold coin and tendered it to Peeconowah.

"Yes, that's so, that's so," he blurted out, "but I had no intent to steal the hat; that's so, I intended to pay the chief for it, pay him well; that's so, here's the money."

"Peeconowah refuses," growled the chief surlily. "Peeconowah must have his hat. The great spirit sent it to him. It brings him good luck. Peeconowah feels that some great chief of the pale faces once wore this hat! Peeconowah needs no gold. The great chief at Washington provides for him! Peeconowah has spoken."



HE SPREAD HIS LONG, STRONG LEGS OVER THE PROSTRATE GIN-GHI.

As he listened to these words, Joshua Merritt was obliged to rest his hand on Gin-Ghi's shoulder to keep from falling.

"Sir," cried Hetty with solemn visage, "if Peeconowah speaks the truth you must return this hat. Captain Waldron, I'm sure, would so order."

The Kickapoos gave forth a loud chorus of grunts of satisfaction. Joshua looked dazed, for an instant his fingers refused to clutch the brim of the Napoleon hat, but he saw that he must obey, and with a groan of disappointment that touched Hetty's heart, the Englishman lifted the Napoleon hat from his head and handed it back to Peeconowah.

At Mrs. Waldron's invitation, Joshua now mounted his horse, and followed by the bewildered Gin-Ghi, accompanied his rescuer to Fort Reno, where Capt. Waldron gave his steamer acquaintance a real soldier's welcome, but the daintiest cuts of wild turkey and prairie fowl and the most delicate and insidious punches which Hetty Waldron could compound failed to lift the gloom from Joshua's heart. He was literally bowed in sorrow, and when he presented himself at the Captain's quarters the next morning he seemed to have grown old in a single night. It was pitiful to note the deep lines that the gall and wormwood of disappointment had eaten into his face. In a silent and mechanical sort of way, Joshua Merritt entered into the sports organized by Capt. Waldron to help them get through the day. Hetty did not join them at dinner, and after Merritt had smoked his pipe for a half hour or so over the nuts and wine, the Captain arose and proposed that they should step over to his mother's quarters and pay their respects.

As Merritt followed his young friend into the house, which, though of rude exterior, was neatly papered and carpeted, the two men halted in the hallway to hang their hats on the rack. As they did so Waldron heard the Englishman suddenly catch his breath and then saw him stagger back against the wall. The Napoleon hat was hanging on the rack! Making a great effort, Joshua Merritt steadied his body and his nerves, then cried out gayly, and in a tone of voice that Capt. Harry had never heard issue from that capacious mouth before:

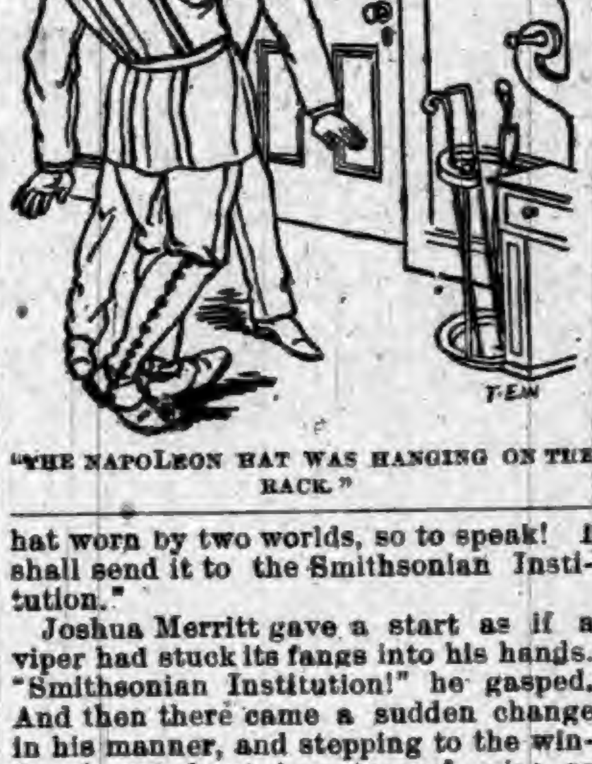
"One moment, Captain; I wasn't expecting to meet any ladies this evening. I fear I'm not in a very presentable rig. Yes, that's so; but then your mother is a wonderful woman—yes, that's so, wonderful. I'm more than delighted to meet her again."

Hetty received her distinguished visitor with a most charming grace and ease, questioned him about the treasures of his museum, described the fascinations of life upon the plains, dilated upon the anticipated pleasure of a sojourn in New York, as her son had been ordered to the East; in a word, exhibited such a delightful flow of spirits and proved herself to be such an altogether charming talker, brimming over with wit and wisdom, that ten times in one hour Joshua Merritt felt himself called upon to whisper the words "wonderful woman" in the Captain's ear. The bugle-call sounded at 9, and the Captain rose and begged to be excused for a half an hour. No sooner had the door closed behind him then Joshua Merritt laid hold of Mrs. Waldron's hands with a clamp-like grasp and whispered: "The Napoleon hat!"

"Is hanging on my rack, Mr. Merritt."

"Your price, your price, madam?" came with almost a rattle from Joshua's throat.

"Oh, I don't feel that I would be justified in selling a relic of such historical importance," said Hetty, solemnly, "a hat worn by two worlds, so to speak! I shall send it to the Smithsonian Institution."



"THE NAPOLEON HAT WAS HANGING ON THE RACK."

Joshua Merritt gave a start as if a viper had stuck its fangs into his hands. "Smithsonian Institution!" he gasped. And then there came a sudden change in his manner, and stepping to the window he cried out in a tone of voice so nearly cheerful as to fairly startle Hetty:

"My dear Mrs. Waldron, what beautiful moonlight nights you have in America; shall we go out for a short walk? It's rather oppressive in-doors."

"But, my dear Mr. Merritt," exclaimed Hetty, "I haven't the countersign: we run a risk of being shot."

"I'll take that risk, gladly, Mrs. Waldron," replied the great collector, with a low bow.

"Do you know, my dear Mrs. Waldron," said Joshua, as they re-entered the house half an hour later, "it looks to me as if the man in the moon had a hat on his head to-night."

Three weeks later, when Mr. and Mrs Joshua Merritt were well on their way to New York, the great collector whispered to her: "But tell me, my dear Hetty, in heaven's name, how did you persuade Peeconowah to give up the Napoleon hat?"

"'Twas simple enough," laughed Hetty; "the Kickapoos had lately murdered an Indian agent, and my son had quite made up his mind to recommend the War Department to send Peeconowah to the Dry Tortugas. Is it plain enough now?"

"Wonderful woman," ejaculated Joshua Merritt.

OUR SWEET NAVAL BELLS.

The Foreigners Stopped Talking to Hear Our Ships' Bells Ring.

The best gift that any American city has made to the cruiser named after it was San Francisco's service of plate to the beautiful ship of that name. There is so much of this great and costly set of plate that the cabinets containing it are found above and below stairs, in the admiral's and captain's quarters and in the wardroom. All the pieces are large and heavy, the biggest being a huge punch bowl of great beauty of design. Every lid in the service is surmounted by a solid gold bear, the symbol of California, and the effect of the bright yellow on the white silver is very pleasing. Philadelphia did very poorly by her ship, now the flagship of Rear Admiral Gherardi. This gift is a great bronze clock that won't keep time; indeed, it won't go. It bears the name of a Philadelphia firm of jewelers, who would be wise either to put the thing in order or chisel the firm name off. This clock is not beautiful. Its design is artistic, but does not work out effectively in bronze.

If the silver bell that this city is to give to the new cruiser New York is as melodious as a silver bell should be, the gift will be prized. Few know it, but the bells that ring out the hours and half hours in our white squadron were the delight of our foreign naval visitors here and in Hampton Roads. All the bells on the white ships contain a great deal of silver, and produce clear, sweet and extra musical notes. Sir John C. Hopkins, the British vice-admiral, would stop his own part in a conversation at any time on his quarter deck on the Blake to listen to the bells on our Yankee ships. He said that they were the sweetest bells he ever heard, and he wished they had such ones in the British navy. In that navy the bells go from ship to ship, as fashions in war change, and on some ship to-day the bell that rang out the time for Nelson or for Blake is tolling away as it did in its hour of glory. One of the Nelson's bells may be on the Australia or the Partridge, but alas! the British do not carve the dates and names of the ships on their bells, and so their especial merits are lost. The old bells are thrown in the dockyards and kept there until one is needed for a new vessel. They are deep-voiced, gruff bells, whose sound soon dies out, while the silvery peals of our bells cling to the air and reach far out upon the waters.—New York Sun.

Where Women Do as They Please.

The independence of Burmese women is remarkable. They manage their own affairs, have stalls in the bazaar, with which no one interferes, marry when they choose and divorce their husbands as soon as they please. No veils cover their faces; no melancholy seclusion prevents them from mixing with the male sex. They dance and laugh with as many admirers as they choose, and last of all they smoke—not dainty cigarettes on the sly, taking a whiff while they read the latest French novel, as their European sisters do, but cigars—longer than those men use in Europe; cigars a foot long and two inches in circumference, the price about a penny; and they smoke them all day.

Horse Lore.

In that portion of Genesis which tells the story of Joseph, the famine, etc., we find the first historical allusion to the horse. Prior to 1066 the horses of England were never shod. Henry VIII. put a stop to the raising of inferior horses in England by having all slaughtered that were under thirteen hands high at the age of five years.

In Japan the man of "quality" never forces his steed out of a walk; if the errand is one which demands speed the rider dismounts, ties the fore legs of his animal together and strikes off at a brisk gallop on foot.

His success in the treatment of piles can be amply attested by hundreds whom he cured during his former visits. I can cure any case of piles, no matter of how long standing, or how hopeless the case may be. The patient suffers no pain or inconvenience. In most cases one treatment is sufficient, which takes only a few minutes, and the time required for a cure is about two weeks, during which time the patient is not inconvenienced from business. 20tf

GOLD still seems to be flowing in from Europe in small quantities.

ASTRONOMERS report a new comet in sight visible to the naked eye.

WORLD's fair will not be open on Sundays. A decisive vote makes this certain.

SILVER men are hopeful that some change in the laws will benefit them and make mining more profitable.

REGATTA at Cedar Beach will be held during the first week in August. Several fine yachts will take part, and a valuable cup will be given to the winner.

INDIANAPOLIS democrats held their city convention last week and re-nominated the present mayor, Mr. Sullivan. He has been a good officer in the main.

HAY crop in Europe is a failure and hay is being sent there from the United States. Perhaps the price will be high enough to offset in some degree, the low price of wheat.

IT IS now claimed that the loss of life at the cold storage building fire on the world's fair grounds, was mainly caused by the desire of the head man of the firemen to "show off" to the great crowd he had to look at him. He began to fight the fire at the top of the cupola, when it was really at the bottom.

FITHIAN, member of congress from Illinois, is preparing a bill to give us free ships under the same conditions we used to have them before republicans came into power and destroyed our foreign commerce. The last congress made two ships free, but to free all of them seemed too sensible a thing for them to tackle.

THE "Viking Ship," a Norwegian boat made exactly on the pattern of the one in which the Norsemen came to these shores in the year 1000, reached Chicago last Wednesday. The curious little craft had sailed across the ocean, and finally up the St. Lawrence and the great lakes. She received a grand welcome.

THE world's fair has in a sort of annex an exhibit by some farmers, to show the old and the new style of fences and fence rows. One has old, crooked and poorly placed rails, with the corners growing wild with dock, plantain, cockle, briers, etc., which have been made to grow there by a great deal of pains and watering. It is probably the first time since the creation, that a farmer has planted and watered a lot of weeds. The other fence is made of bright, nicely woven wire, with neat posts, and a strip of grass along it, that is kept well cropped.

POLITICIANS who are howling for Uncle Sam to "take his 60 cent dollar and put 100 cents into it," do not appear to think what they are saying. It is easy to put 100 cents into the piece, but it would be a third bigger and heavier than it is now. But that is a small matter, for the average citizen would willingly strain his muscles a little to carry them, if he could get them. But the trouble is, how long would it be before we would have to put in more silver? If silver goes down one fifth, then we must put more silver into the dollar again. If silver rises in value, we must change the size and weight so as to make it less. And so we would go on changing the size and weight of the dollar each day, as the price of silver bullion varies. It would be just as sensible to say, "Let the government put a dollar's worth of paper into a paper dollar," for paper don't vary as much in value as silver. Then we would have dollars big enough to cover a band wagon.

THE Dispatch joins its republican contemporaries in asserting that a democratic administration is to blame for the present hard times. It insists that in eight months after Cleveland was elected "wheat went lower than in forty years." Does Cleveland or any president fix the price of wheat? And if it is a law or laws that have a bad effect on business, then who made these laws, democrats or republicans? Democrats have not been able without republican help to make a single national law for about thirty years. Even the McKinley law stands and the Sherman silver bill. Even the "balance of trade" cannot be the result of a democratic administration.

J. P. CHAPMAN became postmaster again at Rome City last Thursday. He was p. m. during Cleveland's first term, and under the ruling of the department which McNagny claims to be following, he could not hold it a second time. McNagny gave to Ab. Kelley at Waterloo, this as the reason for not appointing Ab. As this makes two ex-postmasters he has appointed, while he keeps telling DeKalb folks that he can't do so, we conclude our member has one rule for this county and a different one for the rest of the district. If ex-postmasters are not ruled out, what shall we say of McNagny's assertion that they are ruled out? Both these contrary assertions cannot be true.

JUDGE JOSEPH S. DAILY of Bluffton, has been appointed by Gov. Mathews to take the place on the supreme bench, made vacant by the resignation of Judge Olds. He is already an experienced judge, having been for some time judge of his circuit, the 28th. We presume the appointment will be satisfactory, though many hereabouts would have preferred Marshall or Lowry. We are told that Marshall's chances were injured by a report that got out to the effect that Judge Olds was trying to dictate his appointment. It was even asserted that Judge Olds sent word in advance that he would soon resign, and that gave Marshall an advantage that was finally turned against him. Whether this story is true or false, we believe it hurt Marshall. However as we said before, we believe Judge Daily will be satisfactory. He will likely be as able as some who sit on the bench with him.

THESE money panics might have been avoided if the republican administration in 1890 had faced the issues squarely and enacted a sensible law instead of the Sherman Bill. Sherman's bill was a mere makeshift. He was determined to keep the people from having free silver and so had his law fixed up so that a fixed amount of silver must be bought, but none of it need be coined into money He claimed this would raise the price of silver and it did for a few weeks. Then when people began to realize that no dollars were being made of the silver, they saw the thing was a fraud and lost confidence. They have been losing confidence ever since. And now we begin to see the results, The Sherman law will likely be repealed, but there must be some positive beneficial legislation to take its place. It may come in the form of free silver, or of some other law. Or it may be free silver and some other beneficent law together. But repealing the Sherman act alone will not be sufficient. For our own part, we believe in free silver and do not believe that of necessity a free silver law would unsettle business. There is nothing in the law itself or in any necessary conditions that would interfere with business. The only way a free silver law can be an injury lies in the power that wealthy combinations have to so manipulate money matters as to make trouble. In other words, the evils that can possibly result from a free silver law are all artificial and not natural or necessary. These wealthy combinations could turn any other law into an evil, if they should combine against it as they do against free silver. They could make the present free coinage of gold as bad as a free coinage of silver if they tried as hard. The common people, who do not try to control these things, are as well served and suited with silver money as with gold.

Printing the School Bonds.

The Dispatch objects to our remarks about printing the school bonds to build a school house. We simply said the Dispatch had not said a word against the legallity of the bonds since it was given the job of printing them. This remains true. But it tries to excuse itself by telling how things have been fixed up in such a way as to make the bonds legal since the time it objected to them. As this satisfactory arrangement was certain to be made from the first, the Dispatch is not at all relieved of the charge of finding fault where there was no fault and of crying before it was hurt. It consoles itself by asserting that the town saved $50 by giving it to the Dispatch rather than to Burford. According to this, Burford's bid must have been pretty high, as we are told the Dispatch got $20 for the job, and later on, was ordered to do them over again at an expense of $15 more, making the ten little pieces of paper cost the taxpayers $35. In 1884, the COURIER, at a time when job work was higher than it is now, printed the bonds issued then for $12 50. And there was no bidding by anyone. The board was a democratic board, and came up and gave the job to the COURIER and we charged them what we thought it was worth, and what it is worth now. Had the present board come to us in this case and said they wanted bonds printed, we could have done it at the price named. Since the Dispatch printed the first batch at $20, we informed two of the board what we had done it for in 1884. But in spite of this knowledge, two of the democratic members, Ensley and Picker, the Dispatch asserts, voted to give the second batch to the Dispatch at $15. We do not allude to this matter for the purpose of boasting of the democracy of our town council, but simply to show the hollowness of the Dispatch's claim of wanting the county and the town printing in order to save money for the taxpayers. If the board of commissioners and the town council desire to bankrupt their respective corporations, they can find no surer way than to put themselves without reserve into the hands of the chief adviser of the Dispatch.

The Dispatch as an Adviser.

The Dispatch of last week, in commenting on our criticism of its contradictory course in regard to bridges, makes quite a number of assertions that it can give no reason for making. But that is nothing new, and we may well pass over it One thing, however, is worth noticing. It says it did not "urge the commissioners to increase bridge expenses" last year as we charged it had, and in the next sentence says: "We urged the commissioners to build iron instead of wooden ones." This is a direct contradiction of its own words, and for plain foolishness would do credit to the Garrett Clipper. This last admission was the very thing we urged against the Dispatch. An iron bridge, with stone abutments, costs four times as much as a wooden one, and we showed in the COURIER last year, when the Dispatch was urging these high priced bridges, that such is the difference in expense, and that this great difference put at interest would build a new bridge every four or five years. But the wood bridge would last at least fifteen years If the Dispatch wants people to believe it is as smart as it thinks it is, it must concede that an iron bridge costs more than a wooden one, for the figures show it. Had all the bridges built last year been wooden ones, the bridge expense would have been about $12,000 less. Hence, we repeat, and the Dispatch has virtually admitted it, that the Dispatch's advice was in favor of increasing the bridge expense.

My little boy was very bad off for two months with diarrhea. We used various medicines, also called in two doctors, but nothing did him any good until we used Chamberlain's colic, cholera and diarrhea remedy, which gave immediate relief and soon cured him. One of my customers came in to-day and asked me for the best cough medicine I had, says Lew Young, a prominent druggist of Newman Grove, Neb. I have sold four dozen of it within the last sixty days and do not know of a single case where it failed to give the most perfect satisfaction. 50 cent bottles for sale by Robbins & McCord.

Auburn business men have had a dull season. Though they held out every inducement such as low prices and excellent goods, but little trade could be gained. It seemed that what money there was, was needed for luxuries, and could not be spared to buy necessaries

Editor Strayer and Dr. Burgess of Ashley, were here last week to talk up the interests of great K. P. meeting held there to-morrow, the 21st. They engaged our band to go up and furnish music on that occasion. If good music will draw a crowd they ought to have a good turnout.

The ground had become very dry before the rains of last week, and crops were suffering, although of course it was good weather to barvest the wheat and grass crops. Butter became scarce again and high priced. The heavy rain will help the grass and probably make butter plenty again.

There was a fine shower last Thursday evening at Auburn, and light showers during the night. But on Friday morning we had the hardest rain of the season. About four inches of water fell within one hour. It insures a good potato crop about here, but we do not know how general it was over the county.

Friday afternoon, as the dray was loading at the Zimmerman factory, a freight train was backing along there and scared the horses. They started off so rapidly that the driver could not get to them, and ran down into town, going south on Jackson street till they reached 8th street, and then east to Main street. Just before reaching Main street they passed the ice wagon, when the iceman managed to jump onto the dray, but as he could not reach the lines, this did no good, but in running so far they were getting tired and were slacking up a little when someone caught them by the bits. Not much damage was done.

Mr. Shatto remembered the printer while here, a very graceful thing to do, for the craft suffers more from the dull times of harvest than does any other business.

Visitors are cordially invited to attend this meeting.

Hudson and the people in that section are asking Uncle Sam to change the mail on the Jackson branch of the Lake Shore at Steubenville, north of Summit, the place where the Lake Shore crosses the new Wabash. This is sensible. There is no reason for carrying Auburn and Waterloo mail up to Angola and then sending it back overland to towns along the line of the Wabash.

Mrs. P. K. David, of Garrett, died Sunday after a short illness, a severe form of cholera morbus. She and Mr. David were pioneers of Garrett, having been closely identified with its interests from the first. The was a most estimable lady and will be mourned by the Garrett people. The funeral was yesterday, the interment being at the Union cemetery north of that place.

The Garrett Controller of Destinies still keeps firing away at the COURIER. But in all these years he has never intimated what he is mad at the COURIER for. We said it was because we refused to harbor him longer. This he denies, but does not say what was the trouble. He says that we bought and paid for the "Gold Cure" some years ago, to cure him from drinking, which is true. But we can't see that he had any right to get mad about that. It did not cost him anything and he quit taking it when half way through. Come, let a not very anxious world know what is the trouble.

A close money market is compelling carpet and furniture manufacturers to sacrifice their goods for cash. They are selling many carloads of merchandise at present, for whatever they can get. Now is the time to get new furniture and new carpets. The Foster Furniture and Carpet Co., at Ft. Wayne, Indiana, is the place where you should buy them. Fifty dollars spent with them will go as far as seventy-five spent elsewhere. They show you an immense assortment of the newest and handsomest designs, and will deliver your goods free to Auburn. They have already received a full line of carpets, including all the choicest designs of the celebrated Lowell Carpets, for which they are the Fort Wayne agents. These carpets wear longer and keep their color better than any other make, but are sold at the same price as other Extra Super Ingrains. This firm is also headquarters for baby carriages.

Scurviest piece of job printing we have seen for years was exhibited here this week. It came from the Garrett Clipper office, and it was hard to say which side was the muddiest, the front or back. It was a funeral notice, but looked more like a half decomposed guttersnipe.

Among the COURIER'S friends who helped to cheer up the dull times lately are E. Berry, J. G. Clapp, D. D. Snyder, Judge Best, Joseph Link, Jacob Souder, and Frank Groscop. As receipts come in very slowly at this season, we would be pleased to have those whose subscription is due to take this opportunity to get even, if they have the money to spare, and many have this small amount, who have evidently overlooked the matter.

Last fall I was taken with a kind of summer complaint, accompanied with a wonderful diarrhea. Soon after my wife's sister, who lives with us, was taken the same way. We used almost everything without benefit. Then I said, let us try Chamberlain's colic, cholera and diarrhea remedy, which we did, and that cured us right away. I think much of it, as it did for me what it was recommended to do. John Hertzler, Bethel, Berks county, Pa. 25 and 50 cent bottles for sale by Robbins & McCord.

Many curious and interesting sights are seen on the Midway Plaisance, this street of all nations, the Mecca of all visitors to the great World's Fair at Chicago; but among all its exhibits the "Panorama of the Swiss Alps" is doubtless the most highly artistic. To those whose good fortune it has been to go abroad, this panorama awakens old memories, and to the many who have been less fortunate, this really grand painting is a revelation. It is a perfect representation of the famed Bernese Oberland, as it would appear in all the immensity of reality to a sight seer in the midst of the Alps. The illusion is made perfect by the truthfulness of local color and by the vigorous and sincere painting of such artists as Burnand, Baud-Bovy and Furet. This superb canvas was painted in Paris, France, for the express purpose of exhibition at the World's fair, and has received the well-deserved encomiums of all the French and American artists.

South Bend Times: Governor Matthews has appointed Joseph S. Dailey, of Bluffton, as a member of the supreme court to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Judge Olds. Judge Daily is at present and has been for some years the presiding judge of the Twenty-eighth judicial circuit. He is about fifty years of age and some years ago ran against Colonel George W. Steele for congress in the Eleventh district. He is a clever gentleman and is personally quite popular. As a friend of Governor Matthews the Times feels free to say that as a matter of justice this appointment ought to have been conferred upon the Hon. Robert Lowry, whose profound learning in law, whose experience on the bench, and whose splendid judicial equipment pointed to him as the man to be chosen to fill this vacancy. The supreme court, as at present constituted, needs just such a jurist as Judge Lowry is universally acknowledged to be. His appointment would have been hailed with delight by those who best understand the needs of the highest judicial tribunal in the state. The objections that have been urged against Judge Lowry are in the main puerile and frivolous. Governor Matthews will learn in time that he made a mistake in paying heed to the malign influences that were exerted to "turn down" Robert Lowry.

A Lonesome Journey.

At the Junction Monday morning a little German girl not more than nine or ten years old had come in on a night train, and was waiting for a B. & O train to Chicago, where she was going to join her relatives. She had come alone from the old country; with no baggage but a little dirty white cloth sack, in which we suppose she had her little stock of clothes and eatables. She looked tired out and dirty, but not a complaint was heard. Patiently she waited for the delayed train that was to take her to her people and a new home in the new world that she had made such an effort to reach. How many of our petted daughters would have the courage to undertake such a journey, or the patience to carry it out? Other children in her sight had oranges and other little things dear to the childish heart. But she scarcely had tasted the very unattractive lunch in the little dirty bag, and was satisfied with a drink of water, and started again to complete her long, lonesome journey. Kind railroad men at the Junction and on the train, treated the little stranger with great kindness, and no doubt she is now happy with her friends in the vast and noisy city. The future may yet be very bright for her. Who knows?

SOME idea of the immensity of one of the industries in the State of Maine may be obtained from the fact that during the season just closed over $400,000 was paid out for potatoes at Caribou Station alone, exclusive of what was paid for starch potatoes and what was received by farmers who did their own shipping.

CANADA would like to sell her "Thousand islands," but as she protects her game fish by law far better than Uncle Sam does, sportsmen will object. Your uncle stocks rivers and lakes with fine varieties of fish, and then licenses "the pound," "the gill net," and any other device that is depopulating Lake Erie (the finest fishing lake in the word) of its game fish.

ABOUT 30,000 couples have been divorced in France during the last five years, and now a law has just been read in the Chamber of Deputies for the first time designed to make a severance of the matrimonial bonds much easier still. It provides that a mere judicial separation can be changed to a definite divorce after the lapse of three years on the demand of either party, plaintiff or respondent.

THERE is something cool in the way the English papers speak of the sinking of the Victoria as an "accident." In the same way the fall of the Ford Theater building in Washington was called an "accident." The friends of those whose lives were sacrificed in the last-named casualty have discovered a method of ascertaining whether it was accidental or not; and the friends of the drowned crew of the Victoria will probably make a similar discovery.

THE desecration of the historic field of Gettysburg by the building of an electric railway is an outrage that ought to be stopped at once. The contractors are cutting down trees, digging through hills, removing boulders, and generally disfiguring the landscape. The matter has been brought to the attention of the Secretary of War, who doubts his authority to interfere, and in the meantime the vandalism proceeds.

THE price of coal has taken another upward jump. The announcement is not accompanied by any explanation of the advance, for explanations which do not justify are very unsatisfactory to all parties concerned. The combine charges more for coal simply because it can. It reverses the usual law of supply and demand, and when the smallest supply of coal is needed seeks some compensation for reduced sales by charging a higher rate for what is sold.

THE result of the German elections shows such an increase of socialist strength as bodes ill for the future peace of the country and of Europe. The Government may have power to pass its bill for an increase of the army. If it does so the Emperor will very probably precipitate war in order to unite the patriotic instinct of the German people in defense of the fatherland. That is the game that despotic governments have more than once played. In a government by the people nothing is gained by war, and therefore wars will be avoided wherever possible.

THE famous Marshal Saxe had more sense of incongruity than those who would give him honor. Under Louis XIV. there seemed to be a sort of fever for taking into the French Academy men who were illustrious for things other than literature. When they would have conferred this honor upon Saxe, he promptly refused to accept. In a letter written a little later he says, "They want to pute me in the Cadamy. That would look like a ring on a kat."

A DRASTIC measure for the regulation and restriction of foreign immigration is before the Legislature of New South Wales. It regulates the conditions of residence of foreigners already resident in the colony, restricts the immigration of persons belonging to colored races, and absolutely excludes all Asiatics, "whether subjects of the Queen or not." There is a sentiment in favor of such a measure in the colony, but, as it would have to receive the consent of the crown, it is not likely to become a law in its present form.

SOME curious statistics reach us from Germany. It appears that the result of the latest census showed that there were in that country fourteen millions of single women against fifteen millions of single men; whereas there were two millions of widows against only three-quarters of a million of widowers. From this it would appear that the German widow either abstains from a second experiment in matrimony on the ground of the failure of the first experiment, or that the German men are prejudiced against a widow wife.

SOME of the incidents connected with the financial flurry would be ludicrous under less distressing circumstances. For example, a New Jersey bank, with many Hungarian miners among its depositors, sustained a run of two or three days because the Huns did not understand the significance of the "closed" card, indicating suspension of the day's business at noon on Saturdays. Removing the card had no effect upon the ignorant depositors. The trickle had started, and soon broadened into a dangerous crevasse. The ingenious device of stacking up immense piles of money on the desks had the desired effect. The Huns needed no interpreter to understand the significance of half a cord of bank notes.

IF credence may be given to statistics presented in the late congress of vegetarians at Chicago, the time is drawing very near when the Texas steer and the overgrown Canada lamb will be only a memory. The rapid increase of population will make meat food impossible for the masses. Furthermore, civilization begins to abhor the idea of human beings feeding on flesh, and then comes the clinching argument of the enormous financial saving that would result from purely vegetable diet. There is much force in the views of the vegetarians, but they are wofully lacking in discrimination. Dwellers in the tropics may well be vegetarians, but not so with inhabitants of the arctic zone. The former may live on bananas, but the latter must have their walrus and seal. The average inhabitant of the temperate zones will probably cease eating meat when he can no longer get it—not before.

THE revelations of the census on the birth-rate are beginning to startle people, as they might have done long ago. They show that in 1880 the birth-rate throughout the country was 30.95 in the thousand, while in 1890 it had declined to 26.68 per thousand. The rate and its fluctuations vary in the various States. Leaving Utah out of the calculation, because its peculiar institution has always given it a high birth-rate, we find that the highest birth-rate at present is in the old slave States—the Carolinas, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee—in which the rate ranges from 30 to nearly 34, a decrease of 3 to 4 from 1880; and the lowest in the three Northern New England States, and in California and Nevada, where it is below 20, a decline of 2 to 8 per cent. from 1880. In the group of Northern Central States—Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin—the rate ranges from 24 to 27, a decline of 3 to 4 per cent. from 1880. New York shows a low rate, 23.28, and Connecticut and Massachusetts 21.26 and 21.51, respectively. It is not easy to explain these figures on any generally admitted theory.

Alive and Dead.

A lady had almost decided to buy the coat she was trying on. The weary saleswoman breathed a sigh of relief. The customer had been hard to suit. Even yet she fingered the buttons and twitched the sleeves thoughtfully.

"What was this fur when it was alive?" she asked abruptly, as she adjusted the collar.

The saleswoman hesitated and stammered. She was torn between a business-like desire to make a sale and a conscientious regard for the truth. Her confusion was painful.

"Well, ma'am, we have to call it martin," she said, at last, "but it was skunk when it was alive."

Statistical.

When Gen. Cornwallis surrendered at Yorkton his army of Englishmen consisted, according to military reports, of 7,247 soldiers and 840 sailors—8,087 in all. The number of locomotives now in use on American railways is 32,139, or four times as many as Cornwallis' soldiers and sailors. The number of cars is 1,200,000.

"PROTECTIVE" TARIFFS, BOUNTIES, AND SUBSIDIES.

Object Lesson Furnished by the "Protected" Plate Glass Factories at Irwin, Pa.—Finance and Tariff Changes the Objects of the Administration.

Stop Government Paternalism.

Every honest, self-supporting man, like every honest, self-supporting industry, is a blessing to any community or country. No one will dispute this statement. But few also will dispute the alternative statement that every pauper industry is a curse to a community, to a country and to mankind.

Before our country got started in business on its own account, several of the Federal States, imitating the policy of the mother country, attempted to introduce and foster certain industries—mostly manufacturing ones—by levying duties on certain imports. Thus Pennsylvania in 1785 passed an act entitled "An act to encourage and protect manufactures of this State, by laying additional duties on the importation of certain manufactures which interfere with them."

This system of protection worked so poorly and was such a nuisance to trade between the States that all were glad to abolish it with the adoption of the Constitution in 1787. Immediately thereafter the manufacturers began to ask for national help for their struggling industries. Some attention was paid to their appeals, and the first tariff act gave slight protection to certain industries. Instead of making them self-reliant, this charity only made them clamorous for more assistance. Duties became higher and higher as the industries grew older, until the non-protected industries were forced to defend themselves from the hungry and ungrateful pauper industries. The noisy infants were weaned and were thriving on solid food when our civil war made it necessary to again put them on the bottle while they were being bled to provide a war revenue. The bleeding process lasted but a few years and the bottle should have been discarded long ago, but the sucklings—now mostly centenarians—not only refused to let go, but have demanded and obtained bigger bottles. Through their cries and screams they are informing us that they are incapable of existing on even the high tariff of 25 or 30 per cent., and they lay claim to permanent support on the ground that we, having so long fed them on pap and brought them to their present helpless state, must not now desert them. The woolen and glass manufacturers actually have the audacity to tell us that the assistance which we have given them has made them indigent, careless, and slovenly, so that they cannot exist on the same Government rations as might suffice a few years ago, thus confessing that they lied to us when asking for temporary help to make them stronger.

The effect of granting aid by means of Government bounties or subsidies is almost as great a curse as "protection." Our shipping industry never declined so rapidly as when we were trying to aid it by means of gratuities and to shield it from the severe competition of Europe's unassisted lines by prohibiting the importation of foreign-built ships. The continued use of both of these methods fails to wean back any considerable portion of the carrying trade of the world which was once ours, when our ships asked no aid from any quarter.

The bounties we are now giving to sugar producers are having the same weakening effect. It is for this reason that Governor Hogg, on behalf of the State of Texas, spurned the bounty to which Texas was entitled as a sugar producer. He knew the evils industrially and politically sure to flow from governmental "encouragement" to industries properly the subjects of private enterprise.

Paternalism as applied to the silver-producing industry is also beginning to manifest the same evils. The shameful contract which, for political purposes, the last administration made with the mine-owners, to take their silver at prices which are now twice the actual worth of this metal in all other markets, may have stimulated this industry for a long time and added a few more to our already long list of bounty-fed millionaires, but it will soon be clear that it has hurt the industry of extracting silver from our ores and that it has rendered almost helpless and homeless thousands of miners whom it has drawn from farms and shops.

All of these evils are the result of attempting what is impossible. Protection cannot become universal. When all industries are "protected" the benefit to each is more than annulled by the assessments necessary to aid all of the others. Protection may for a time stimulate a few industries, but it is always at the expense of the self-supporting industries. All industries cannot become paupers any more than all men can become paupers or pensioners. They must have others upon which to lean or they will be in the impossible position of leaning upon themselves.—Byron W. Holt.

Tariff Raised; Wages Lowered.

The Pennsylvania Plate Glass Company, at Irwin, Pa., made the generous proposition to their employes during the latter part of last week, that if they would accept a 10 per cent. reduction in wages the factory would not shut down but continue in operation the year round. A meeting of the employes was called at the works at which it was decided not to accept a reduction under any consideration. This, we think, was a proper move, as the plate worker is now the poorest paid of skilled mechanics in the country, and to ask a reduction in wages is simply adding insult to injury. The conceding of a reduction at Irwin would mean a reduction at all the other plate works, and would be placing the wages of the plate glass worker on a par with common labor. Any fair-minded man will admit that the wages paid the average plate glass worker to-day is not above actual living expenses, and a reduction could not be conceded without reducing him to want. It is rumored that this company is becoming dissatisfied with the central selling agency and may withdraw from that concern in the near future.

If this straw at Irwin is any indication of how the plate glass trust intends to make the wind blow after a two months' shut down, the plate glass workers of the United States had better all get together and resist, firmly and unitedly such contemplated reduction. There is neither sense, reason nor justice in any proposition to reduce the wages in this industry. The tariff was increased on certain small sizes in 1890, and since 1864 (or for 30 years past) there has not been a single reduction of the tariff, which has been uniformly kept at 141 per cent. on sizes of 24x60 and above. This protection has has been kept at this enormous figure ostensibly to protect the American plate glass worker against the cheap product of European labor.

If added to the present pauper wages paid the American worker is to receive now the "protection" of a further 10 per cent. reduction, the 12,000 toilers from whose labor the colossal plate glass works have been built, and millions in dividends have been squeezed, had better make up their minds to take a hand in practical politics themselves.—National Glass Budget, July 1.

Must Be Studied by All.

I wish to go over all the ground upon which protective tariffs are advocated or defended, to consider what effect the opposite policy of free trade would have, and to stop not until conclusions are reached of which we may feel absolutely sure.

To some it may seem too much to think that this can be done. For a century no question of public policy has been so widely and persistently debated as that of Protection vs. Free Trade. Yet it seems to-day as far as ever from settlement—so far, indeed, that many have come to deem it a question as to which no certain conclusions can be reached, and many more to regard it as too complex and abstruse to be understood by those who have not equipped themselves by long study.

This is, indeed, a hopeless view. We may safely leave many branches of knowledge to such as can devote themselves to special pursuits. We may safely accept what chemists tell us of chemistry, or astronomers of astronomy, or philologists of the development of language, or anatomists of our internal structure, for not only are there in such investigations no pecuniary temptations to warp the judgment; but the ordinary duties of men and citizens do not call for such special knowledge, and the great body of a people may entertain the crudest notions as to such things and yet lead happy and useful lives. Far different, however, is it with matters which relate to the production and distribution of wealth, and which thus directly affect the comfort and livelihood of men. The intelligence which can alone safely guide in these matters must be the intelligence of the masses, for as to such things it is the common opinion, and not the opinion of the learned few, that finds expression in legislation.

If the knowledge required for the proper ordering of public affairs be like the knowledge required for the prediction of an eclipse, the making of a chemical analysis, or the decipherment of a cuneiform inscription, or even like the knowledge required in any branch of art or handicraft, then the shortness of human life and the necessities of human existence must forever condemn the masses of men to ignorance of matters which directly affect their means of subsistence. If this be so, then popular government is hopeless, and, confronted on one side by the fact, to which all experience testifies, that a people can never safely trust to any portion of their number the making of regulations which affect their earnings, and on the other by the fact that the masses can never see for themselves the effect of such regulations, the only prospect before mankind is that the many must always be ruled and robbed by the few.—Henry George, in Protection or Free Trade.

"Free Trade Incendiary Torch."

It might be supposed that protection manufacturers and editors would some day learn that the people of this country can no longer be fooled by a pretended comparison of "protected" with unprotected countries, which stops when it has mentioned Great Britain and the United States. The Manufacturer (Philadelphia), of June 24, says: "The picture drawn by our correspondent in London of the great crowds of men assembling at Liverpool on the chance that they might be sent to Hull to get work on the docks there, at the time of the dockers' strike, shows what it must be here as soon as the free-trade incendiaries successfully apply to the fabric of our industries the torch of destruction which they have been brandishing."

Are there, then, no other countries on this big round earth? If there are, they must, of necessity, be protection or free trade countries. As a matter of fact there are a half dozen countries, all in Europe, which for age, degree of civilization and natural opportunities are far better adapted for comparison with each other than with any newer or bigger country. These countries are Great Britain, France, Germany, Spain, Italy and Turkey. Each of these countries has at some period been master of Europe, and held the ascendency in commerce. Until near the middle of the present century it was not certain which of the first three countries would take the lead in manufactures, commerce, and trade. The free-trade incendiary torch was first applied to England's industries. Instead of destroying, it fired them with new life and energy. England chose freedom and light, and the growth of her industries is without parallel on the Eastern continent. She is supreme in commerce. She is overflowing with wealth, and loans capital to the rest of the world. She pays higher wages than is paid by any of her old country rivals, and yet undersells them all. She is the only country of the old world to which emigrants turn with a hope of bettering their financial conditions. The other countries mentioned chose restrictions of commerce, and are still wandering in darkness and misery. Italy and Spain, with most restrictions, have sunk almost out of sight in the commercial world. France and Germany are losing step with the march of progress, and must soon fall out of line if they do not imitate the example of Great Britain. The idleness in London is partly due to the congestion there of the miserable wretches who have been squeezed out of continental Europe by commercial bandages which decrease earnings and increase the cost of living.

The Platform Not Forgotten.

If there are persons who believe the silly stories now going the round of the Republican press, charging that President Cleveland and the other Democratic leaders have abandoned all idea of making any radical changes in the tariff at the coming session of Congress, they had better begin to prepare themselves for a great disappointment. There has been no change in the program mapped out by the Democratic leaders before Mr. Cleveland was inaugurated, except that caused by the financial stringency throughout the country, which has given financial reform the first place on the program, but has by no means displaced tariff reform. Ever since President Cleveland's election he has been discussing these two reforms with every man he met who might be supposed to have practical and valuable opinions upon either, and he has lost no opportunity to obtain suggestions from those whose practical experience or special studies have made them tariff experts. A perfect tariff bill has never been prepared and probably never will be, but unless present indications are all wrong the tariff bill to be prepared this winter will be nearer perfection, from the standpoint of the Chicago platform, than any of its predecessors, and that it will be a radical change from the McKinley law is as certain as that Congress will meet.—Saturday Budget.

CITY OF ALPENA.

Description of the Most Magnificent Steel Passenger Steamer on the Lakes.

The Detroit and Cleveland Steam Navigation Company's new steamer "City of Alpena," built by the Detroit Dry Dock Company, made her trial trip the 28th day of June, showing a speed of 20 miles per hour. She is the largest and most magnificent steel passenger steamer on the lakes, costing over $300,000. The cabins are furnished in mahogany, and possess the novel feature, on the upper lakes, of an additional tier of state-rooms; the upper tier is reached by a broad, endless gallery. There are 150 state-rooms and parlors, each provided with electric annunciators, wire and patent mattresses, Pullman blankets, and illuminated by electricity.

Electric lights in state-rooms are no more a novely, but the lamp-fittings on the 500 incandescent lamps will attract attention. The electric call button in each state-room, is a novelty, and one that will be thoroughly appreciated by the passengers. It is placed so that the passengers in each berth can reach it without rising. There 144 of these buttons on the boat.

After looking over the boat, the most luxurious feature, and one that will be appreciated, is the barber shop and bathrooms, and just aft the ladies' and gentlemens' toilet rooms. Parties who make a long journey by rail and have no time to go to a hotel before reaching the boat, or business men hurrying through their duties on a hot day may take a bath in the most approved style. Then there are two state rooms forward that are furnished a little more elegantly, and are more roomy than the others.

In case anything should happen the boat, there are eight water-tight bulkheads that would keep the steamer afloat under any circumstances. The stability of the construction need not be detailed any more than to say that the builders whose boats have a reputation for strength and efficiency, have used more than usual care in building this boat.

The general effect of the decoration, which is in the style of Louis XV., is dark, shading to light. The woodwork and finish are in Honduras mahonany, and the blue wilton carpets with old gold figures relieve the dark effect of the mahogany. The ornamentation in the main cabin is beautiful, but the second cabin, with its ivory and gold relief in contrast, surpasses it. The panels in the ends of the state-rooms are in gold, relieved by ornaments in raised gold.

The dining-room has deadlights arranged in pairs, but the most important feature is the ventilation by the McCreary cold air system; air is drawn down a shaft through a ventilator and is passed over ice and cold water before it is liberated in the dining-room where a roast and the odor of victuals are usually given in addition to what is found on the menu card.

A separate cabin is provided on the main deck for passengers without state-rooms. The lower saloons have been devoted exclusively to the dining-room, kitchen, and pantry, thus separating the culinary departments entirely from the main saloons and sleeping apartments. In fact, all departments are supplied with every modern convenience that experience can devise or money procure to make this steamer unsurpassed for safety, comfort, and pleasure.

The dimensions of the new Floating Palace:—Length of keel, 264 feet; breadth of hull, 38 feet; breath of beam, over all, 70 feet; moulded depth, 15 feet. The hull is of steel. The propelling power is low pressure compound beam engine of 3,000 horse power, diameter L. P. cylinders 66 inches bore, diameter H. P. cylinders 42 inches bore, and 11 feet stroke. The paddle wheels are of the Morgan feathering pattern, adopted by this Company for their great speed, without jar or noise. The boilers are double enders, equaling four boilers with Howden force draft; capacity 130 pounds steam pressure. Steam steering apparatus place this immense vessel under the contro l of one man.

An interesting feature of the steamer is the stack, the style of having two stacks as in all other boats of the line having been abandoned for a single stack which is oval, and is six feet wide and seven feet long, and is 59½ feet high from the boilers to the top. In this boat only about one-half of the stack shows above the top of the cabins. Divided up it would make ten moderate sized staterooms.

The steamer "City of Alpena" runs between Toledo, Detroit, and Mackinac Island, making close connections at the latter point for Chicago, Petoskey, Bay View, Sault Ste Marie, Marquette, and Duluth.

Gossip that is Profitable.

In China there is a profession for ladies, strange, because openly and handsomely remunerated in the current coin of the realm. It is carried on by elderly ladies, who go from house to house of rich people announcing their coming by beating a drum and offering their services to amuse the lady of the house. The offer accepted, they sit down and tell the latest scandal and the newest stories and on dits and are rewarded at the rate of one-half crown an hour, besides a handsome present should some portion of their gossip have proved particularly acceptable.—Chicago Herald.

Reform in Spelling.

The changes adopted by the society for reforming spelling are the substitution of f for ph where possible, e for æ or œ, the omission of the final ue, me and te in such word as dialogue, program and quartette, and of the final e wherever it is not required by the sound.

Breezy and Generous.

The San Franciscans must be a good-natured people. Perhaps there is something in the Pacific Ocean which softens and subdues the rugged places in human nature. Mrs. Caroline C. Leighton, whose little book upon "Life at Puget Sound" has attracted so much attention of late, mentions several pleasing instances of Californian generosity.

She speaks of a man so crippled that he could only get along by drawing the whole length of his body upon the sidewalk, like a large reptile, but who managed to earn his living by selling newspapers, which were laid in a pile on his back, so that he was his own news-stand.

Men passing by helped themselves to a paper, and tossed a silver coin into his box, always refusing the change. The man had a bright, sunny, sailor face, and seemed to enjoy life very much.

A different but still more striking example of the ready sympathy of the Californians, was presented to her while waiting one day at the Oakland Ferry.

Two men entered the place, one of whom carried in his hand a pair of crutches, which he proceeded to nail up against the wall, crossed, close to the gateway where passengers passed to the boat. His companion arranged some light drapery above them in the form of wings; and beneath these symbols they placed a small table with the photograph of a little news-boy upon it.

Mrs. Leighton inquired the meaning of this arrangement, and was told that it was the stand of a little cripple who for two or three years had been accustomed to furnish papers to passengers.

He had just died, and, as some money was necessary to pay his funeral expenses and assist the family, his friends had taken this dramatic method, so eminently Californian, of aking for contributions.

"All the business men, the every-day passengers, crossing to their home on the Oakland side," she says, "appeared to understand it, and quietly laid some piece of money beside the picture. Men who would have been very likely to meet a subscription paper with indifference, on being appealed to in this poetic manner, with no word spoken, only seeing the discarded crutches and the white wings above, with moist eyes laid their little tribute below as if it were a satisfaction to do so."—Youths' Companion.

The Approaching Dinner Hour

Is fraught with no pleasant anticipations for the unhappy mortal plagued with dyspepsia. Appetite seldom, discomfort after and between meals, always is his portion. Heartburn and flatulence subsequent to eating, a gnawing at the pit of the stomach before it, are only a few among the woes arising from this truly impish complaint. Sick headache, nervousness, constipation and biliousness are its diabolical offspring. Each and all of them are annihilated by Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which tones the gastric organs and regulates the liver and the bowels with certainty and promptitude. Chills and fever, kidney trouble, rheumatism and neuralgia are also remedied by this medicine of rare purity and comprehensive uses. Invalids of all kinds are greatly and swiftly benefited by it.

Newspapers and Progress.

Newspapers, above all other enterprises, must keep up with the march of progress, says Murat Halstead. Fifteen years ago a New York newspaper in getting a new outfit of printing presses congratulated itself that the acme of perfection had been reached and that no change would be needed until the presses were worn out. But in less than five years every one of these presses were in the junk shop, although they were doing better work than when first set up, and from $15,000 to $25,000 had to be sacrificed on every one of them. They were not worn out, but new inventions had put them behind the times.

MAKES ITSELF FELT

—the great, griping, old-fashioned pill. Not only when you take it, but unpleasant, from first to last, and it only gives you a little temporary good.

The things to take its place are Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets. One of these at a dose will regulate the whole system perfectly. They're tiny, sugar-coated granules, scarcely larger than mustard seeds. They act in Nature's own way. No reaction afterward. Their help lasts and they do permanent good. Constipation, Indigestion, Bilious Attacks, Sick or Bilious Headaches, and all derangements of the liver, stomach, and bowels are prevented, relieved, and cured.

They're the cheapest, for they're guaranteed to give satisfaction or money is returned. Nothing can be "just as good."

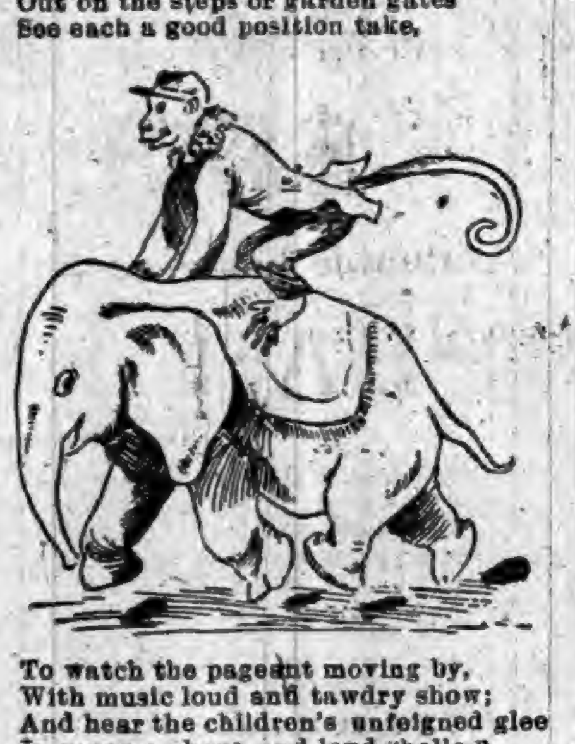
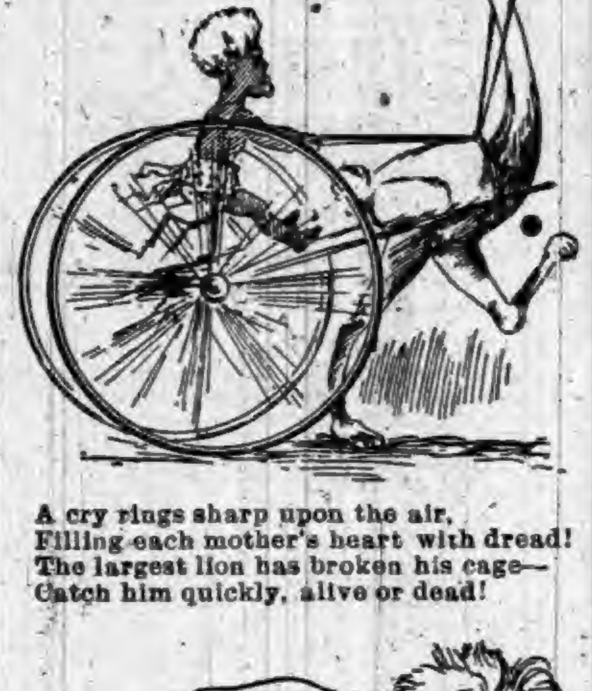
The Lion's Escape from the Circus.

Here's the circus coming to town!
Every child is alert and awake.
Out on the steps or garden gates
See each a good position take,

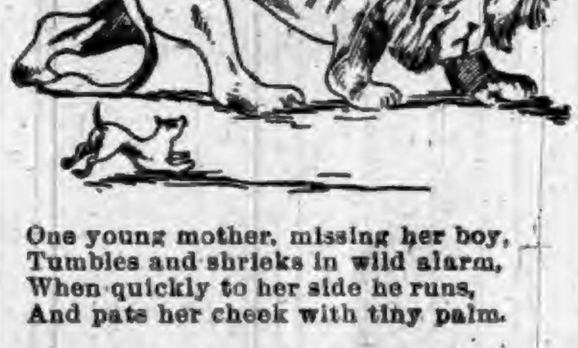


To watch the pageant moving by,
With music loud and tawdry show;
And hear the children's unfeigned glee
In many a shout and loud "hollo."

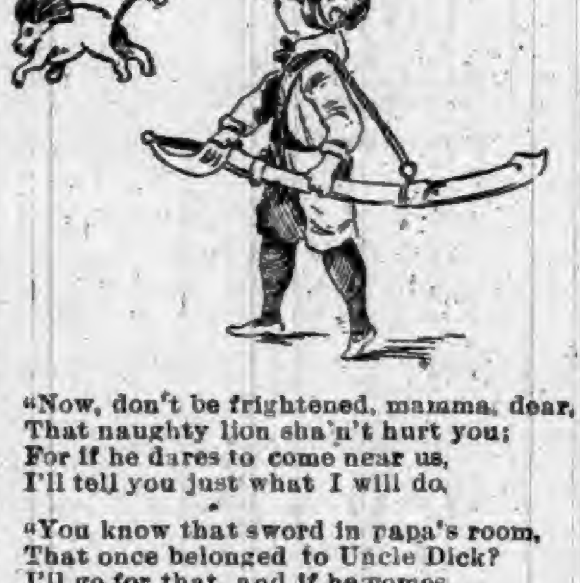
"Hear the band! It's playing now!
The elephant is marching slow!
The baby elephant comes, too!
Oh, mother, mother, may I go!"



A cry rings sharp upon the air,
Filling each mother's heart with dread!
The largest lion has broken his cage—
Catch him quickly, alive or dead!



One young mother, missing her boy,
Tumbles and shrieks in wild alarm,
When quickly to her side he runs,
And pats her cheek with tiny palm.

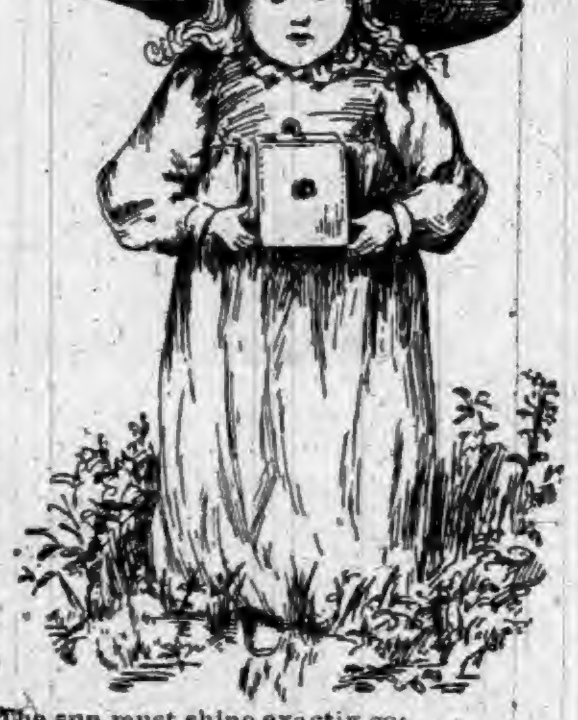


"Now, don't be frightened, mamma, dear,
That naughty lion sha'n't hurt you;
For if he dares to come near us,
I'll tell you just what I will do.

"You know that sword in papa's room,
That once belonged to Uncle Dick?
I'll go for that, and if he comes,
I'll cut his head off pretty quick!"
—Our Little Ones.

An Amateur.

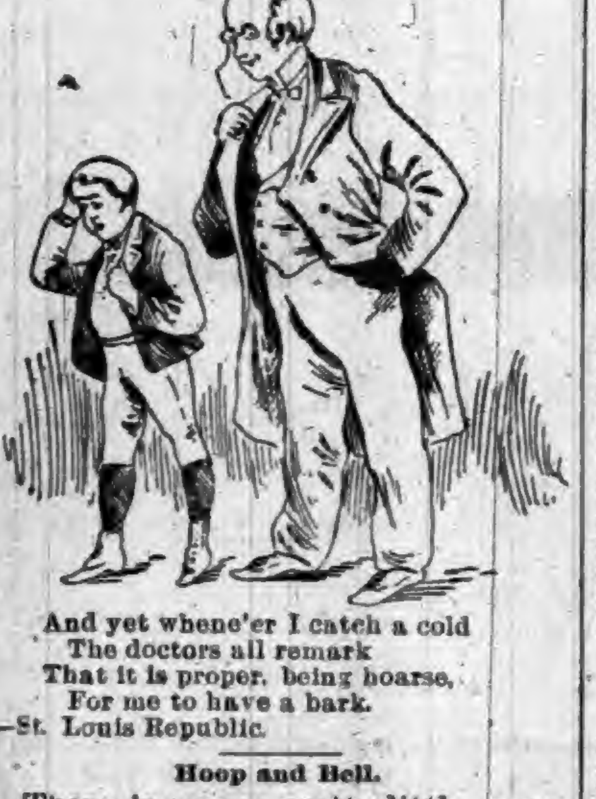
When Polly takes your photograph,
Woe unto you if you should laugh;
If you should sneeze or even blink,
Or let her catch you in a wink.
The breeze, pro tem, must cease to blow,



The sun must shine exactly so;
All nature work in her behalf
When Polly takes your photograph.
—Truth.

One of the Queer Things.

It's very strange, it seems to me,
The things that doctors say.
We know that little doggies bark,
And that all horses neigh.



And yet whene'er I catch a cold
The doctors all remark
That it is proper, being hoarse,
For me to have a bark.
—St. Louis Republic.

Hoop and Bell.

There is a very pretty little game in which both hoops and balls are used, but the balls are not thrown to be caught and the hoops are not rolled. You get six wooden hoops, all of different sizes, such as will measure from 12 to 30 inches across. Fasten on each a little screw-hook to hang it up by. Next prepare a place to suspend the hoops. That may be a stout wire fixed across the playroom about seven feet from the floor, or you can put your wire across the attic between rafters, at the same height, or you can put the wire in the barn. If you wish to play outdoors have the wire stretched between trees. Now, just where the hook is, fasten to each hoop a cord reaching to the center of the hoop, with a bell attached to the end. To play, you throw a rubber or worsted ball at each hoop in turn. If it goes through the hoop without ringing the bell it counts by fives, according to the size of the hoop, the largest five, the smallest thirty. But if the ball goes through and rings the bells you add ten to the count. If it rings the bell and falls back without going through the hoop, count only ten. The game is 500. Each player throws at all the hoops every time it is his turn. This is a good play any time and anywhere, and it is the very best rainy-day game that I know of, in a barn, or an attic, or the play-room.

The Little Donkey.

I am a donkey and I belong to a very happy family of toys. Our little mistress always puts us close together when she makes us walk round the dining-room table every Sunday. There would be nothing to complain of if only our little mistress had no brothers, but, alas! she has two, and oh, such scamps. When we hear them come into the schoolroom in the evening after school our paint turns faint from fear, for we know what is in store for us. The boys are not quite so bad now as they were. They used to turn Noah's ark upside down on the floor, put the animals up in rows upon the table, and then shoot at us with a horrible toy cannon loaded with peas. It was anything but pleasant, I can tell you. Generally half of us were knocked off the table onto the floor. One night I saw my poor friend the bear stamped on. Freddie picked him up and said; "I've done for this old chap; let's put him in the fire. If Nellie comes up and sees him broken she will only howl and make a fuss." So into the fire my poor friend went, and you can imagine my feelings better than I can describe them. Pretty soon our little mistress came into the room. Her distress at the loss of the bear was very great. Her father came in and wanted to know what she was crying about, and he was very angry when he heard what had happened, and scolded his boys for teasing Nellie. I think for the moment they were sorry. They did not mean to torment, but Freddie, the elder, was a terrible boy from a toy's point of view. Things went more smoothly for a day or two, and then the same thing happened, and again we were made to face the terrible cannon. Alas, I was the unfortunate victim, and one of my forelegs was shot off. Nellie was consoled by making a bed up for me in one of the rooms of her doll's house, and there for many days I was nursed by the sweetest little doll you ever saw. Now I am quite well again—but how I dread those boys!

"We Four."

Out in the street Jack found, one day,
An old umbrella, thrown away.
"Better than nothing," he merrily said,
As a cloud sent its raindrops down on his head.
Along came Bob "Any lodgings to let?"
"Yes," laughed Jack. "Come in out of the wet."
Then Will came up with a "Halloo, boys!
What's the occasion for all this noise?"
"Come along in," said Jack, "an' see!"
So the old umbrella gave shelter to three,
And last of all, as they laughed together,
A doggy, who hated such rainy weather,
Came slinking by, with his tail drawn in,
And a very uncomfortable soaking skin.
"Come in with the rest of us, do," cried Will.
And doggie wagged a grateful "I will."
"There now," laughed Jack, "we're fixed, we four,
An' there isn't any lodgings to let for more."

TO MAKE FINGERS TAPER.

A Newly Patented Device Which Was Used by the Ancients.

A few months ago the United States Patent Office granted letters to the patentees of what was regarded as a most unique and novel invention. It was called the device for tapering fingers, and it was thought that it would be of utmost popularity with ladies throughout the land. The application for the patent was accompanied by illustrative drawings showing the beneficial effects of the device, and pictures of ladies' lily white fingers taken before and after the use of the invention.

The supposed novelty and originality of this beauty-producing device led a reporter to examine the model on which the patent was granted. To his astonishment he found that finger-tapering devices of various kinds have been patented for several years back, and that there was nothing at all new or wonderful in this latest effort of Yankee ingenuity. Indeed, Examiner Marvin, of that division in the patent office, who has charge of the examination of applications for inventions similar to that of the finger taperer, showed the reporter a whole batch of patents on inventions designed to heighten the beauty of woman's face and form, and many that were intended for the benefit of fastidious Beau Brummels as well.

As for the finger-tapering device upon which the original patent was granted, it is simply a series of little steel bands, shaped something like a clothespin, which are slipped over the finger at night when the beauty retires to rest, the pressure being made tighter toward the end of the fingers. It is a device well known to the ancient Greeks and Romans, and it is thought by Examiners Marvin, Rice and other experts in the Patent Office, who have spent long years examining this class of inventions, that perhaps its revival now is due to the popularity of typewriting machines and type-writing girls.—Washington Post.

True Christianity.

The fact is coming to be more and more recognized that religion does not consist so much in church-going as it does in Christian character, and that the man who publishes a newspaper Sunday may be doing more active service for God than he who occupies a front pew that day and squeezes his neighbor financially the rest of the week.—New York Herald.

Small Hands in Women.

A Paris sculptor says that the day will come when women will be ashamed of too small hands.

SUCCESSFUL SPECULATION.

How Stephen Girard Started His Drayman on the Road to Fortune.

The advice of a shrewd business man is sometimes of more value, even in a financial sense, than direct aid.

It proved to be so in the case of a drayman who was employed by Stephen Girard the Philadelphia merchant.

One day the drayman, who was an industrious, bright fellow with a good many mouths to fill at home, was heard to remark that he wished he was rich.

"What's that?" sharply said Mr. Girard, who heard the grumble.

"Oh," said the man, "I was only wishing I was rich."

"Well, why don't you get rich?" said the millionaire, harshly.

"I don't know how without money," returned the drayman.

"You don't need money," said Girard.

The man laughed.

"Well, if you will tell me how to get rich without money, I won't let the grass grow before trying it," returned the other.

"There is going to be a ship load of confiscated tea sold by auction tomorrow at the wharf. Go down there and buy it in, and then come to me."

"I have no money to buy a whole ship-load of tea with," he said.

"You don't need any money, I tell you," snapped the old man. "Go down and bid on the whole cargo, and then come to me."

The next day the drayman went down to the sale. A large crowd of retailers were present, and the auctioneer said that those bidding would have the privilege of taking one case or the whole ship-load, and that the bidding would be on the pound.

He then began the sale. A retail grocer started the bidding, and the drayman raised him.

On seeing this, the crowd gazed with no small amount of surprise. When the case was knocked down to the drayman, the auctioneer said he supposed the buyer desired only the one case.

"I'll take the whole ship-load," coolly returned the successful bidder.

The auctioneer was astonished; but, on some one whispering to him that it was Girard's man who was the speaker, his manner changed, and he said he supposed it was all right.

The news soon spread that Girard was buying tea in large quantities, and the price rose several cents.

"Go and sell your tea," said Girard to the drayman the next day.

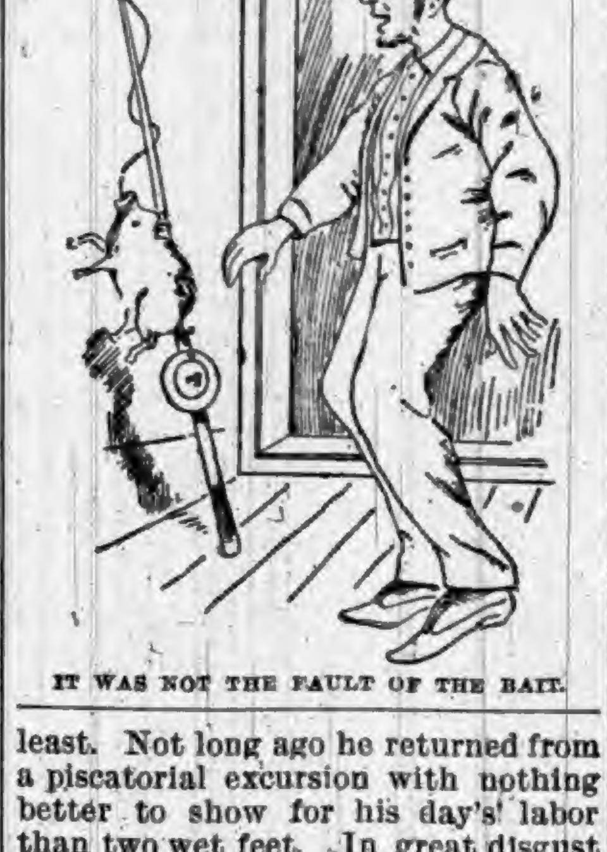
The drayman was shrewd, and he went out and made contracts with several brokers to take the stock at a shade below the market price, thereby making a quick sale.

In a few hours he was worth fifty thousand dollars.

A POSTPONED CATCH.

Peculiar Luck of a Maine Fisherman that Came Late.

There is a man in North Turner, Me., who will probably never cease boasting of one bit of fishing luck at least.



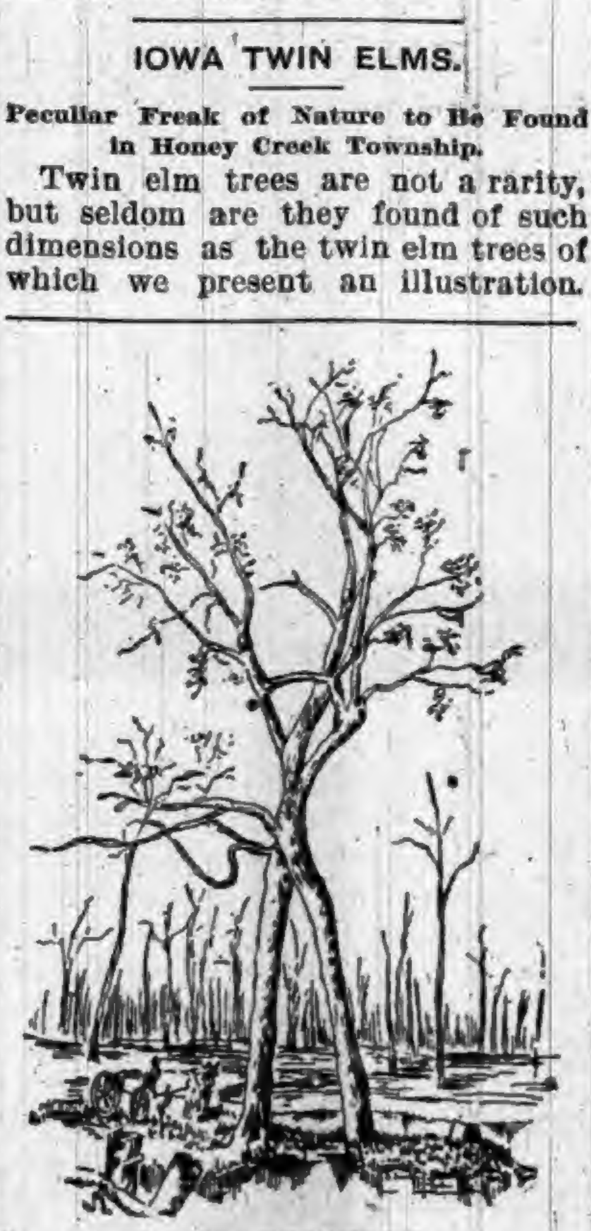
IT WAS NOT THE FAULT OF THE BAIT.

Not long ago he returned from a piscatorial excursion with nothing better to show for his day's labor than two wet feet. In great disgust he leaned the fish pole up against the house beside the door and disclaimed any knowledge of the fish market. The next morning his astonished eyes fell on a good fat hedgehog dangling from the hook. His "bait" of the day before can hardly be held accountable for the event.

IOWA TWIN ELMS.

Peculiar Freak of Nature to Be Found in Honey Creek Township.

Twin elm trees are not a rarity, but seldom are they found of such dimensions as the twin elm trees of which we present an illustration.



THE TWIN ELM TREES.

The twin elms grow in Honey Creek Township, Iowa County, Iowa, and they stand below the point of junction, seven feet apart. It is 30 feet from the ground to where they unite and the point of union is 3 feet in diameter for 10 feet. The body of each tree is 2½ feet in diameter and the greatest height 90 feet.

None but Royal

Baking Powder is absolutely pure. No other equals it, or approaches it in leavening strength, purity, or wholesomeness. (See U. S. Gov't Reports.) No other is made from cream of tartar specially refined for it and chemically pure. No other makes such light, sweet, finely-flavored, and wholesome food. No other will maintain its strength without loss until used, or will make bread or cake that will keep fresh so long, or that can be eaten hot with impunity, even by dyspeptics. No other is so economical.

If you want the Best Food, Royal Baking Powder is indispensable.

Experiments in Telepathy.

Experiments in "telepathy" are in favor for evening entertainments. A simple one that is intensely interesting, and that may include a number of persons, consists in blindfolding one of them and forming a circle in which all stand with hands joined. A card is selected from a pack and placed where it may plainly be seen by all but the person blindfolded. He is expected to maintain a perfectly passive state, while the attention of the others is fixed exclusively on the card. After a time the image of the object on the card is "suggested to the mind" and named. In one instance where this experiment was tried the ten of diamonds was on the card selected, and the blindfolded person, being ignorant of the object decided upon, described ten real diamonds that he saw arranged as they would be upon the card. In blindfolding the light may be entirely shut out from the eyes by folding kid gloves into pads to lay over them, and then binding with a handkerchief.—New York Evening Post.

Confined Sound.

The intensity of confined sound is finely illustrated at Causbrook Castle, Isle of Wight, where there is a well 200 feet deep and twelve feet in diameter, walled or lined with smooth masonry. Although this is an unusual depth for a well, even in the British Isles, yet when a pin is dropped into it the sound of it striking the surface of the water 182 feet below can be distinctly heard.

In the cast-iron water pipe of Paris, which forms a continuous tube with only two slight crooks, and those near its middle, the lowest whisper at one end may be distinctly heard at the other, although the pipe is 3,120 feet in length. When some experiments in this line were being conducted, a pistol fired at one end of the tube actually blew out a lighted candle held at the other end and violently ejected the shavings, feathers, paper, etc., which had been placed in the end of the pipe by the experimenters.

Collections.

The Prince of Wales has been renowned on the Continent for his collection of pipes. Perhaps he may have such a museum, and we must, in the meanwhile, trust the word of the Parisian journalist for it; he is always remarkably well-informed. What is more certain is that the Czar is a collector of postage stamps and eggs of birds of prey; and the German Emperor, King of Romania, and the King of Sweden have a mania for autographs; and the Queen of Italy collects gloves and shoes that have belonged to sovereigns; she has lately had a shoe presented to her that was worn by the Czarina Catherine, and the most ancient shoe in the Queen's museum dates 400 years back.

The Music Stopped.

Among a number of young men who were recently visiting the city was one who has a lively sense of humor and an impediment in his speech. A german was given in their honor, and the hostess observed that this particular young man did not dance.

"I am surprised not to see you dancing," she said "Don't you care for it?"

"Oh, y-yes," he replied.

"Then why haven't you gotten a partner and joined in the amusement."

"W-w-well," he explained, "it's th-this way. I h-h-have tried s-several t-t-times. B-b-but b-by the t-time I have s-succeeded in t-telling a g-g-girl wh-what I w-want th-the music's ss-topped."—Washington Star.

Driving Drugs Through the Skin.

One of the new features of electric medication is the introduction of drugs into the human body through the skin. This is done by placing solutions of any drug upon a sponge, which is made the positive pole and placed against the skin. When the current is turned on the drug is actually driven through the skin into the tissues. The application is not at all painful. Thus cocaine has been driven in over a painful nerve, and neuralgia has been relieved by it.—New York Sun.

Criminal Offense.

"Ya-a-s," said Willie Wishington, "she said that she was stwuck with my appearance."

"It's a wonder," replied the friend, who dislikes Willie's ideas as to clothes, "that she didn't have you arrested for assault and battery."—Washington Star.

Correctly Analyzed.

The chemistry professor grew reminiscent (says the Boston Budget) and told how a woman came to him some years ago for instruction in chemistry. The class grew interested. "I told her," said Professor C——, "that we didn't take women students, and advised her to go to Tufts. Well, she went. She took a long course in organic chemistry under Professor H—, and at last she married him." The class looked more interested. Then one member raised his hand. "Well, Mr. Jones?" "Sort of chemical union, wasn't it professor?"

How Swiss Children go to Sleep.

The Swiss people are very artistic in their tastes, and even the poorest Swiss is neat and tasteful in his home life. Many of the ways of the Swiss are as pretty as their fanciful ideas of building houses. A Swiss mother believes that her child will have had bad dreams unless it is crooned to sleep. And so, bending low over the drowsy little one's couch, she sings soothing songs of green pastures and still waters until the little child has breathed itself peacefully into the land of Nod.—New York Ledger.

Curfew in New England.

In some of the New England towns and villages it is still customary to ring a church or factory bell at 9 o'clock at night and no further back than war times it was a general practice in the cities of over 20,000 people. This custom perpetuates the curfew (couvre feu, cover fire) of William the Conqueror's time, when church bells were rung to notify the people that it was time to bank the fires and put out lights.

The Waterloo Normal has a good attendance Profs. Coe and Keep are calculated to make it a success and make it profitable to students or teachers.

We can hardly take a walk in any direction without coming upon a new cement walk. John S. Jackman has one of the latest, and it is a good one.

J. N. McBride has resigned his office as postmaster. His resignation will take effect August first. He claims there is no money in it. Many hold a different opinion and would gladly test the thing for themselves.

Mrs. Jacob Showalter died within the week. She was quite aged, and has been very feeble for some time. Mr. Showalter himself is in poor health, and needing the tender care of his daughter, Mrs. Sparks. He is one of the early inhabitants of Waterloo.

There is a greater demand for Paris green to put on potatoes than any other article, at this time. Not only does the regular striped bug get in its work, but cultivators complain of a long black bug that flies. Between the two, only watchfulness and labor will secure potatoes.

Rev. J. L. Kemp, pastor of the Free Methodist church here has arrived. He and his family occupy appartments over Mrs. Winslow's drugstore. Mr. Kemp hopes to build up the church in numbers, and bring back the badly scattered flock. Mr. Taylor, the retiring pastor, has engaged in other business.

THE VOYAGE HOME

Sailing the Summer Seas o'er or Kissing of the Salt Sea Waves.

Scene on the beach 4 a. m.: Four men speaking the English language sitting close together on the wet sand, one black and three white. They are discussing the situation. Three are without hats, and one whom they address as "Joe" is without shoes. They are all very, very hungry and wet and exhausted. The first streaks of the coming dawn disclose to them a watery waste to the north, a densely wooded range of mountains to the south, and both east and west a long stretch of lonely sandy beach. Where were we and what should we now do? We knew of a town some 50 miles to the east that we had passed the day previous. Should we have to walk all that distance without food or covering? While we were thus discussing, a man came walking along the beach, evidently a Spaniard, as he did not understand our questions, but we followed him and soon found ourselves wending our way among tall cocoanut trees over a serpentine path that led to a small native village. Here we found but one man who could understand our language, and he but meagerly. His name was Serapha Brohana. We asked him for shelter and food. He granted our requests. He took us to his leaf hut and gave us the best he had in the way of hotel accommodations, which consisted of a couple of cowhides spread upon the sand for a bed and some miserable coffee and hard baked balls of dough which he called bread. His good wife also made for us a queer kind of tough cake, made from corn grated over a rough iron. They called the stuff torteas, and I have no doubt in its efficacy to allay hunger, but VanSickler and Gene did not take kindly to this strange food. They were constantly dreaming of strawberries and cream and custard pies and ham and eggs and other such trash as folks eat up north. But I grew fat and saucy on our sumptuous fare. But this sort of thing grew monotonous. We had all made a solemn vow to nevermore go to sea on a native craft. Charlie, our colored friend, said he would walk the beach to New Orleans before he should risk another trip in an open boat. One week passed and we grew tired sleeping on our untanned cowhides. We would go out on the beach and cast longing eyes toward the direction of Balize. On the seventh day we broke all our previous vows and once more set sail for Balize in an open boat. This boat was manned by two Spanish Indians, the Caribs having returned to their homes at Duke of Macho. Again we sailed over the dancing waves and I assure you, four greater cowards never went to sea in boats. Our previous experience had taken all bravery from us. A strong trade wind blew steadily from the east and made the sea quite rough. At nightfall we entered a small but secure harbor surrounded by high, rocky cliffs. A beautiful spot, picturesque in the extreme. No one lived about here. All was as wild as when Columbus first sailed in these waters. Here we cast anchor and rested until early dawn, then sailing directly away from the land for the Balize side, we were at last out of sight of land with the sun setting low in the west. Just as the sun was bathing his brow in the silvery waves, the Indians pointed out to us a low green object far away on the horizon. It proved to be the first of the thousand coral islands that surround Balize for about one hundred miles. Night came on and we were skimming along over the beds of coral rock. By the light of the new moon we could see that the water was only a few feet deep. A stiff sea breeze carried us along at race horse speed. Island after island passed by, but uninhabited they offered us no protection. Presently a grinding sound on the boat's bottom—we had struck a rock but no damage done. Charlie looked sad and dejected. All of us were sullenly watching the treacherous rocks, when crash! bang! and we were high and dry upon a coral reef. Luckily, our boat was a staunch one, thoroughly adapted to running the rocks. After about thirty minutes, prying and pulling, they succeeded in getting her off the rocks and away again to the west. Five times we struck the rocks and we were getting accustomed to this, for it seemed the regular thing. About eleven p. m. we sighted a light on an island. Here we landed and found the island to be about five acres in extent, entirely covered with tall cocoanut trees with a small house in the center and a leaf shed on the shore. Under this shed we lay down in the sand with a small log for a pillow and tried to rest, but a rain coming on, the shed afforded us no protection, as the sides were not enclosed and the wind blew the rain on our lowly bed. We left the shed and ventured toward the house where we could see a light burning, and three large, vicious dogs came howling at us. I ran at them and tried to scare them, but it only had the effect to make them more aggressive. Then the man of the house came out and we asked for shelter and he generously let us stand under the eaves of the cook's shanty, which was a little distance from the main house. Here we not only got the benefit of the rain, but all the water from the eaves came directly on our heads. Again the good man came out and told us we might go into his cook shanty. We gladly accepted and groped our way in the dark shanty and found a sand floor and sitting in the sand we could feel many long necked bottles filled with something which we supposed to be cocoanut oil. Wet and tired out, we sat down and soon I dropped asleep, the back of my neck resting on the neck of one of the aforesaid bottles. It was a rather hard pillow, but in a strange land it is best not to be too particular about one's bed furniture. While it was yet dark, I awoke and found that I could not close my mouth, the bottle neck having affected one of the chords. I got up and started for the door, but stumbled and fell over Gene, who, starting up, asked me what was the matter. With my mouth wide open I could not speak to explain, but could only say "ah, ah." Gene, thinking I had gone insane over my hardships, ran after me as I ran out in the darkness. After rubbing my chords awhile, I could explain. At dawn we again sailed toward Balize.

Stricken Down with Heart Disease.

Dr. Miles Medical Co., Elkhart, Ind.

GENTLEMEN: I feel it my duty, as well as a pleasure, to publish, unsolicited, to the world the benefit received from DR. MILES' RESTORATIVE REMEDIES. I was stricken down with Heart Disease and its complications, a rapid pulse varying from 90 to 140 beats per minute, a choking or burning sensation in the wind pipe, oppression in the chest, much pain in the region of the heart and below lower rib, pain in the arms, shortness of breath, sleeplessness, weakness and general debility. The arteries in my neck would throb violently, the throbbing of my heart could be heard across a large room and would shake my whole body. I was so nervous that I could not hold my hand steady. I have been under the treatment of eminent physicians, and have taken gallons of Patent Medicine without the least benefit. A friend recommended your remedies. She was cured by Dr. Miles' remedies. I have taken three bottles of your New Heart Cure and two bottles Nervine. My pulse is normal, I have no more violent throbbing of the heart. I AM A WELL MAN. I sincerely recommend every one with symptoms of Heart Disease to take Dr. Miles' Restorative Remedies and be cured.

AUBURN AND VICINITY.

Some Reminiscences of its Early Days and Pioneer Citizens.

1871—Continued.

The friends of a railroad appropriation in Union township succeeded in causing a levy of 90c on each $100, to be placed against its taxpayers to make up the sum of $5,592 60 and the money was collected but as not authorized by statute, was given into the custody of the trustee and by him used to the interests of the township to consequent advantage in later low levies; all the benefits that in any case could have accrued from the railroad have been realized. As a rule the principle of bonding a city or county for railroad construction taking from the people to enrich a few persons associated or a company is unjustifiable since in rare instances does the stock issued in return for subscriptions, long have value.

Generally the road is sold under mortgage foreclosure and the stock becomes worthless, and it would be interesting to know if any of the Auburn subscribers realized anything on the stock given them about this time.

Memories of the old regulator associations and their tragic but effectual discipline of criminals were revised in June 1871 by the filing with the county auditor of articles of association of a horse thief detecting society by leading citizens of Concord township and the appointment therewith of a number of constables. The act was a reminder not only of the past but a revelation of yet existing lawlessness and the simple fact that such action had been taken proved a timely and potent deterrent to actual and possible evil doers.

While Auburn in 1871, as shown by the tax duplicates, numbered no rich men as affluence is estimated at present, her wealthiest citizens being represented by such men as Alonzo Lockwood who held much real estate and John P. Widney dealer in promissory notes county and township warrants; neither did the town contain any so poor but that they somehow made a living; and of the twenty persons inmates of the county asylum, not one was from the county seat.

From its nearness to Auburn, the poor farm has ever been a patron of our stores and groceries for supplies and an object of interest to her citizens. The fields in 1871 were highly tilled, and very productive. A fine barn 85x40 feet was built near the asylum by Messrs. Culver and Houston at a cost of about $1,800 and much money at intervals since has been expended in drainage and additional buildings.

A report published by Conrad Miller, superintendent, for a year, has items of special interest as a basis for present comparison since no such statement has since been made public. The expenditures amounted to $1915.04 which included among other items, the salary of the supt., $600; for labor $302; for provisions $304.36; for clothing $294.62; for incidentals $277.95

The report stated in detail the kind and amount of farm produce of which sales were made to the value of $377.65

Of the inmates at this time, some yet remain and the years have slowly and surely made this to them an actual asylum in which life has passed not unhappily.

They have ever been fortunate in the sterling good qualities of successive superintendents and their wives.

Jonathan Rummel who followed Mr. Miller was a veteran of four years meritorious service in the Union army and a model official and his wife was exceptionally well qualified by kind and humane feelings to care for these unfortunates.

When Mr. Rummel left the farm, it was thought to be difficult to fill the place but it was admirably done by Charles P. Glazier whose stay was self-terminated that he might engage in hotel keeping in Auburn early in 1893.

Occupying middle ground in respect to property, living for years without seeing even neighboring towns in their habit of home staying, the railroad was an innoviation and the numerous strangers a novelty to the townspeople. The spiritual wants of our people were watched over by the different churches and their parlors and it can be said in truth that in no previous year had these civilising institutions been more flourishing nor had better prospects for the future.

The Baptists were canvassing for subscriptions for church construction with gratifying success. The Lutherans were agitating the question of building. The Rev. H. H. Sandoe of Liberty Center, Ohio, preached in the St. John Reformed church. A movement was on foot to procure an excellent Presbyterian minister resulting in securing the Rev. Mr. Fowler while A. W. Lamport pastor of the M. E. church held protracted meeting with large attendance general awakening and enthusiastic spirit and later came prominently before the public in an able, earnest and well maintained doctrinal controversy with John P. Widney a man of sound judgment, trenchant and logical in argument and a believer in Universal salvation.

Our schools were declared to be in the ascendancy and each day added new confidence in our school system. The building was substantial, teachers efficient, many pupils were willing, and over all presided an experienced school board.

The public term closed on March 31, after a session of sixteen weeks during which the enrollment was 244 but, the irregularity of attendance was strikingly shown by a reported daily average of 161. The High School representation had been limited to three students in Ray's Algebra and Harkness' Latin and two in Mayhews' Bookkeeping and enrollment to 43 pupils.

The select fall term conducted by W. H. McIntosh assisted by C. P. Houser and Mrs. E. Lowy began under favorable auspices on Aug. 14th with an enrollment of 155 equably divided among the teachers, and was so successful that the school board composed of Messrs. Griswold, Hollopeter and Davis decided to retain the teachers and thereupon engaged Messrs. McIntosh and Houser and also Miss Laura Clark and Miss Emma Hull for a three months session for the respective sums of $225, $150 and $60. The term began Nov. 27. The enrollment was 240 in all the schools. The number in the High School department was 56 and their per cent of attendance was 85.

It was stated impartially that the Principal "stood at the head of his profession" whether true or not, he never faltered in assiduity nor spared himself, and his reward and the town's advantage was a school characterized by creditable interest and satisfactory progress.

THE VOYAGE HOME

Siling the Summer Sea o'er or Kissing of the Salt Sea Waves.

Scene No. 3. An open boat, with all sails set, gliding over coral beds with racehorse speed. Two dark, swarthy Spanish Indians; one holding firmly to the helm, the other standing by the sails. One American negro, with a woebegone expression on his face. Three Yankees, famished, tired, hungry and ragged, lying about promiscuously on the deck. They were sadder, but wiser men than they had been two weeks before. Once they had fine clothes in plenty and money galore; but now all these much desired requisites were forever laid to rest in the bottom of the deep. But we consoled ourselves by knowing that our food would feed the fishes and the monsters of the deep could array themselves in our finery and the fabled mermaids would rejoice over the sack of silver coin so kindly dropped among them. A stiff breeze swiftly wafted us onward over shining coral beds and among hundreds of low wooded islands, until about three o'clock in the after- a bright white speck in the distance indicated that we were drawing near the capital of Balize. The white speck widened out until a city of no mean pretentions opened out before us. We were met at the wharf by a gruff English official, who brusquely asked us, "Where you from?" We told him we were from the Colorado River. Again he queried, "Where is the Colorado River?" We explained the location and he directed us to the best hotel in the city. I shall never forget that march through the main thoroughfare of the town, with our clothes rent and torn, with disheveled hair (for our combs were in possession of the fishes) and with beards grown rough (for we had given our razors to the scaly tribe also). The truth was, we were ashamed of our appearance. We entered the hotel and were ready to register our names, but the careful proprietor scanned our scanty, time worn garb, and seemed satisfied that we were tramps, and without hesitation told us that he had no room for us. Sadly we wended our way to a second rate place, where, through the kindness of a Hungarian Jew, we were given lodgment. After taking refreshments, we went shopping to the best stores in the city. The clerks would look at us and then show us only the poorest, cheapest goods they had, for surely we looked as though we had no money to buy as much as a straw hat. But they were mistaken, for beneath those rags were gold and banknotes that the ruthless sea had failed to tear from our grasp. We soon emerged from our rags as the beautiful butterfly comes forth from the uncouth caterpillar. Seventeen happy days were spent here and we learned much of this interesting British colony of tropical America. Long before Herjulfsen sailed from Greenland to the then unknown western world, this summer land was the home of a numerous and enlightened people, from whence and to where no one now knows, but they have left behind them evidences of mechanical skill and architectural ability far superior to that shown by the ancient Egyptians. Some antiquarians pronounce these ruins to be not less than one hundred thousand years old. Others try to account for their extremely ancient appearance by the peculiar climatical influence of this portion of the tropics. However it may be, these people lived and loved long before the countries of Western Europe had evoluted from barbarism. The city of Balize is situated at the mouth of a river of the same name and is the center of the British Central American trade. Everything about the place seems finished. Walls of concrete surround every waterway. The houses are all roofed with iron or tile. The streets are all narrow, but cleanly swept.

The population consists of negroes, Spanish Indians, Zambos, Mestizos, and Creoles, with a few whites—about one in twenty of pure white blood. Vehicles are but little used. Most of the traffic is carried on the heads of negroes. The shoulders are not made use of. One of those dusky Amazons can easily poise a barrel of flour on her cranium and carry the same a mile without seeming fatigue. They have a market every morning in a large low building covering half an acre, and it is a strange, un-American sight to stand on the bridge and watch the dusky throng as they go plodding by with loads of the various productions of the country on their heads. Mangoes and mamie apples are in season now and are healthful and delicious food. Sugar pines as large as a man's head and of exquisite taste are brought in by the boat load. Bananas and plantains are stacked high on every side. These fruits, with the various kinds of tubers, form the principal food of the lower and middle lower and middle classes. There is also always on the market fish in great abundance, clams and conks fresh from the sea, turtles in their season, goat meat and beef. This city seems to exist principally on law. Officials are in sight at at every turn of the street. An army of colored policemen are on duty night and day. People are arrested for the most trivial offenses and sentenced to long terms at hard labor. Court is carried on with a hurry and despatch that would confound our Auburn legal fraternity. I saw ten cases tried and disposed of in as many hours. Every prisoner was found guilty and promptly set to work on the streets in the chain gang with terms ranging from one to three years. Petty quarrels are numerous, but serious crimes are almost unknown. A large London steamer laden with mahogany lay in the harbor. She would stop at Norfolk, Va., to coal. We engaged passage, got on board and were off for Uncle Sam's domain. There were many passengers for "Ye Old Country" and after much kissing, hand shaking and sobbing, the final parting of friends, the last farewell to those on shore, a fluttering of white kerchiefs until the signals of their loved ones faded away in the far distance, and we were plowing our way to the northward. To me this was a voyage of very pleasant memories, and after seven days we again set our feet upon American soil. So endeth the story of our second return from the land of eternal summer.

Again adieu,
JOSEPH A. SHADE.

Obituary.

Albert H., son of Levi and Eunice Rohm, was born in Richland township, DeKalb county, Ind., Oct. 29, 1872, and died at the home of his parents July 14, 1893, aged 20 years, 8 months and 15 days. The deceased was a dutiful obliging child, always ready and willing to obey the wishes of his parents, and was loved and respected by all who knew him. His last sickness was spinal and brain affection, with which he suffered about three weeks, when he calmly fell asleep. He leaves a father, mother, a brother and a sister to mourn his loss. But we trust that their loss may be his eternal gain. The funeral services were conducted by Elder James Barton. Text, Job, 14th chapter and 14th verse. Interment in the Union Church grave yard.

EVENTS OF INTEREST

THAT OCCURRED DURING THE PAST WEEK.

Powder House Explosion Kills Two Persons—An American Missionary Inhumanly Treated—Piratical Outbreak—The French Minister Leaves Bangkok.

BLOWN TO ATOMS.

Powder House Explosion at Huntington, Ind.

A powder house located on the river bank at the western limits of Huntington, Ind., and containing twenty-five pounds of dynamite and 600 pounds of powder, was blown to atoms in some mysterious manner. Two bodies were discovered in the vicinity horribly mangled, one being identified as Hugh Harvey, about twenty years old, and the other lad is believed to be Homer Householder. So terrific was the explosion that window glass was broken a half mile away and buildings in the heart of the city trembled with the shock. The powder house was completely wiped out of existence, no two bricks remaining upon each other. The bodies of the victims were blown a distance of 200 yards. They were stripped of their clothing and Harvey's head was found some distance from the body. A shirt band alone remained upon one body, while the other was identified by his shoes only. No one knows what caused the explosion.

The fact that both victims were seen in the vicinity of the powder house with a target gun before the explosion seems to indicate that the magazine was fired by a stray bullet. John Gooley, engaged in drilling a well near by, was struck on the left arm by flying debris, but escaped severe injury.

Unprovoked Attack.

New York special: "Letters received by the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions in this city contains news of an unprovoked attack upon Miss Anna Melton, an American missionary, who was stationed at the time of the outrage in a little village among the Nesterian Mountains in Turkey. Miss Melton escaped with her life but was mercilessly beaten and bruised. The letters containing the story of the assault are dated from Amadia, Turkey, June 14 last. The matter has been called to the attention of the State Department at Washington.

No More Silver.

The United States sub-treasury at Chicago refuses to receive any more silver. "We are unable to handle the big amount of silver we have on hand," said one of the officials, "and until it can be all counted and checked up we will not receive any more over the counter. For some time past great quantities of silver have been brought here by the banks to be exchanged for currency until the amount has become greater than we can handle, and we have had to call a temporary halt. This is all there is to the matter."

Ten Millions for Indiana.

Nicholas Ensley, United States Pension Agent for the district of Indiana, has forwarded to Washington the report of his office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1893. The report shows that there was distributed through the agency during the year the sum of $11,880,117.47. About $10,000,000 of this amount was paid to veterans who lived in Indiana. The next payment at the agency will begin August 4. It is expected that there will be paid out between the 4th and 10th of the month about $3,000,000.

Piratical Outbreak.

Singapore special: A piratical outbreak occurred among the Achinez passengers on board the Dutch steamer Rajah Kongsee, trading on the east coast of Achon. The Achinez attacked the crew of the steamer, killing the English captain, mate, and twenty-two of the Asiatic sailors and wounded fifteen others. They then quitted the vessel, taking some of the passengers as captives. The steamer, with the wounded, is now in Dutch hands.

Looks Like War.

Bangkok (Siam.) special: M. Pavie, French Minister resident, has lowered the flag over his office, and has notified the Siamese Government that he will leave the city to go aboard the French warship Inconstante. He has requested the Government to provide pilots to conduct the Lutin and Comets down the river. French subjects in Bangkok will be placed under the protection of the Dutch consul.

Attempt to Destroy the Books.

There was a mysterious fire at Huntington, Ind., in the office of the Western Lime Company. The safe was opened, and the account books were taken out and piled on the floor, after which a match was applied. The blaze was extinguished before much loss accrued. It seemed to be the purpose to destroy nothing but the books.

Factory Burned.

The bonnet wire factory of Moses F. Clark & Co., at Medfield, Mass., was struck by lightning and together with its contents destroyed by fire. Loss $20,000, insurance $12,000.

Jockey Killed.

Jockey Thomas Flynn was thrown from his mount at the Brighton Beach race track and received injuries from which he died soon after. Flynn was mounted on Subrosa.

BATTLE WITH TRAMPS.

One Killed and Two Mortally Wounded Near Sheffield.

Two men were mortally wounded and one instantly killed in a pitched battle between tramps and citizens near Sheffield, Ind. The dead man is known as Al. Jennings, alias "Butch," of Toledo, Ohio, shot through the heart. The mortally wounded: Jack Gallagher, Allentown, Pa., shot through the body at the base of the spine; George Dorch, village of Whiting, driver for South Chicago Brewing Company, shot through abdomen and groin.

The tramps, nine in number, led by Gallagher, a one-armed ex-convict, attacked a cabin occupied by a fisherman named William Tims, who was sheltering a huntsman, William Purdy, with whom Gallagher had been fighting. In the cabin was Tims' daughter, Mrs Emil Stolly, who had given birth to an infant an hour before. Her husband and George Doron were also within. The battle was a hot one while it lasted, but the tramp's ammunition was limited, and when it was exhausted they were quickly routed. Purdy after the melee guarded Gallagher from neighbors bent on a lynching. By the accidental discharge of a shotgun in the crowd of people that gathered later, Deputy Sheriff Elliott of Crown Point, Ind., was wounded in the calf of the leg, Martin Donald, a huntsman, in the left arm, and Frank Zehnifsky, a woodman, in the left leg. The scene of the battle is an isolated place in the swampy region, near the Indiana-Illinois State line at the head of Lake Michigan.

A BLOODY BATTLE.

The Fleming Bandits Pursued Into the Mountains.

Another battle has been fought on the bloody border ground between Kentucky and Virginia. As a result four of Virginia's State troops are dead, six are dying, and Oliver Fleming is shot through the body, probably a mortal wound.

For years the Fleming brothers and an innumerable following of relatives have terrorized the mountainous regions of southwest Virginia and southwest Kentucky, defying alike the authorities of first one State and then the other. The family stands charged with almost all the crimes on the calendar, from murder and stealing down to moonshining. Every member of the family is utterly fearless and all are well armed. Their strongholds in the caves of the Cumberland Mountains are many and almost inaccessible.

About eight months ago a family of three were attacked in their cabin, the the man shot at the door, his wife brutally outraged and then shot, as was also her child. They were left for dead, but the woman lived long enough to make a statement to the effect that the Flemings were the guilty parties.

For a long time no effort was made to arrest them. Finally the Sheriff of Wise County secured the co-operation of the State, and backed by the militia, sixty strong, and each member sworn in as a deputy sheriff, started out to run the gang to the earth.

In some way the Flemings got wind of the proposed attack, and instead of flying, they hastened to meet the troops. The soldiers were ambushed in a deep and heavily wooded ravine, and the Flemings, armed with Winchesters, did deadly work. They killed four soldiers outright and fatally shot six others. Only one of the outlaws, Oliver Fleming, was shot, and he is believed to be mortally wounded. The militia stubbornly held their ground, however, and at last drove the outlaws back, but did not succeed in capturing any but the one wounded. The dead and wounded and the prisoner were placed in charge of a detail of twenty men, who started back to the county seat, while the Sheriff and the remaining forty members continued in pursuit of the three Flemings, who are reinforced by two others.

PAULDING

The Ohio Town Nearly Wiped off the Earth.

For the third time within two years the flourishing little town of Paulding, Ohio, was visited by a most disastrous fire. The two previous fires were bad enough, but the more recent one exceeded all the previous ones in point of destructiveness, and nearly wiped the business portion of the town out of existence. The fire originated in the Famous Clothing House, from what cause is unknown, and continued with increasing fury until thirty-nine of the principle business houses of the town were laid in ashes. Paulding had one of the handsomest court houses in northwestern Ohio, was comparitively new and was the pride of the city, but to-day it is a mass of smouldering ruins. The Thompson House and other of the principal business blocks around the public square fell a victim to the flames. The fire department was utterly powerless to check the advance of the fire, and it was only when it exhausted itself through the lack of further food that it was gotten under control. The loss will run into hundreds of thousands of dollars and, while the insurance is liberal, it will not near cover the loss.

FRIGHTFUL WRECK.

An Excursion Train Collides With a Freight.

Buffalo special: The excursion train carrying the Sunday schools of the Bethany and Bethlehelm churches of Buffalo, on the Western New York and Pennsylvania railroad, was wrecked at East Aurora, N. Y. One man was fatally injured and fourteen to twenty others, old and young, more or less seriously hurt.

Two engines were crushed into masses of twisted steel, and lying in the bottom of the turntable were covered with the timbers, broken glass, and iron of the two first coaches. These were filled with excursionists and that they escaped with no more serious injury is almost miraculous.

As near as can be learned the accident was due to carelessness. The scene in the wrecked coaches was almost indescribable, the women and children being thrown under and over the seats and through the windows, cut with flying splinters, broken and bruised limbs.

The coaches took fire from the engines, but this additional horror was averted by the prompt action of the village fire department.

FRENCH FIRE

Poured Into the Siamese Forts and Hundreds Killed and Wounded.

A dispatch to the Paris Temps from Saigon says:

"A telegram from Strungtreng announces that Captain Villers, commanding the French forces at Không, reopened fire upon the Siamese on the morning of July 19. In the course of the day the French captured Forts Dondua, Dongo, and Donhan, thus confining the enemy to Fort Donsom.

"The last-named stronghold, though protected by three series of well-constructed fortifications, was captured on the following day, without loss to the French, who now occupy the entire group of islands. Only the town of Khong remains to be captured. It is estimated that 300 Siamese were killed and 200 were wounded in the last encounters."

A Bangkok dispatch says that the Siamese Government, which is anxiously awaiting advice from Great Britain as to the French territorial claims, has been informed by Lord Roseberry that the British Government must first receive Lord Dufferin's report on the matter.

The Sherman Act.

The New York Bondbuyer prints the following: "Just as we go to press we learn that President Cleveland has had made by one of the most competent of officers of the Government, a thorough canvass of both houses of Congress on the silver question. The conclusion reached by the President's canvasser points to a long and exciting and bitter contest in both branches of Congress. The eventful repeal of the bill may be brought about, but not promptly. The extra session will doubtless run into the regular session without an agreement on this disturbing question."

OUT OF WORK

An Army of Laborers in Denver and Colorado, But Nothing to Do.

Denver special: The closing down of many silver mines and smelters and the reduction of working forces of coal mines, railways, and manufactories, because of the reduction of the price of silver, has caused a deplorable condition of affairs among the laboring classes. It is estimated that there are 10,000 men in Denver unable to secure employment. There are 20,000 in outside towns in the same condition, one-half of whom are making their way to this city, where they will become a public charge if conditions do not speedily change. In order to avoid this all the commercial bodies in this city will meet with representatives of eastern roads, and the latter will be asked to make a $5 rate from here to the Missouri River for this class of people. It is argued that these men are not paupers, but if they can get into the agricultural districts they will be able to secure employment in the harvest fields, where men will soon be in demand. The Typographical Union has appropriated $1,000 for the purpose of sending unemployed men to their homes in the east. The railways have been asked to make a $15 rate for the men to any point between here and Chicago.

A Michigan Village Wiped Out by Fire.

The business portion of the town of Ewen, Mich., 150 miles down the South Shore Railroad, has been entirely destroyed by fire. It is a village of some 2,000 people and in the whole place only two stores are left standing. The fire is said to have been of incendiary origin, and a message received at the South Shore office says the homeless people are holding as a prisoner a man supposed to have started the blaze. He is almost certain to be lynched as the people are worked up almost to a frenzy by the loss of their property. The loss is about a quarter of a million and the insurance less than $50,000.

Burned to Death.

Three men were burned to death in a fire at an oil well near Toledo, Ohio. Their names are: David Arnitt, contractor; Lemuel Lockhart, oil dresser; David Ramsy, driller. The well was being drilled on a farm belonging to the Ohio Oil Company, about half way between Freeport and Woodside. The last screw was being turned, when the well suddenly began to flow furiously. The flood of oil soon reached the boilers near by and ignited. So rapidly did the fires spread that only two workmen out of five escaped with their lives, and they were terribly and perhaps fatally burned. All the men are married.

Lizard in His Stomach.

A young man named Wilbur Richey, employed as a farm-hand near Wheat Ridge, Ohio, while drinking from a spring about ten days ago swallowed a lizard. Physicians so far have been unable to render him any relief, and it is feared it will cause his death, as he is in a precarious condition, not being able to partake of any food except a small quantity of soup and milk.

Fatal Blast.

While contractors were blasting rock at the corner of One Hundred and Twenty-second street and Fourth avenue, New York, an explosion sent a huge mass of rock, weighing about two tons, crushing through the side wall of 61 East One Hundred and Twenty-second street, killing two people and seriously injuring three, who will probably die.

Rate Cutting Begins.

Chicago special: The Hocking Valley, in connection with the Chicago & Erie, has made a $5 rate for the round trip from Columbus to Chicago. The Pennsylvania, Big Four, and Baltimore & Ohio will be compelled to meet the reduction.

Took Cramps.

Charles Sames was drowned in Sager's Pond, Valparaiso, Ind. With companions he was bathing in the pond, when he was seized with cramps. Uttering a cry of "Help!" he sank before assistance could reach him.

Found Her Boy Dead.

When Mrs. Ervin Lang of Elkhart, Ind., awoke the other morning she found her young son, who had been sleeping by her side, dead. He was apparently well when he retired.

Brakeman Killed.

W. D. Woods, a brakeman on the Fort Wayne Railroad, fell between the cars between Canton and Massillon and had both legs taken off. He died soon after.

Farmer Killed.

John Krider, a wealthy and prominent farmer, was thrown from his wagon at Elkhart, Ind., by his runaway team and his skull fractured, from which he died.

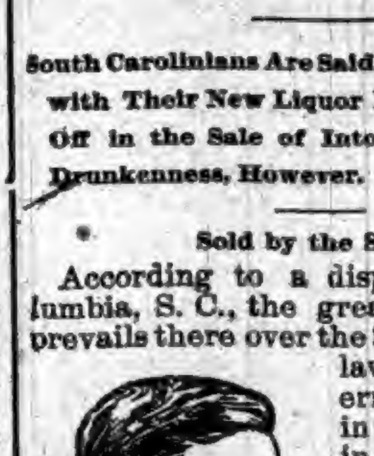
STATE GROG SHOPS.

THE PALMETTO DISPENSARIES CAUSE EXCITEMENT.

South Carolinians Are Said to Be Dissatisfied with Their New Liquor Law—Big Falling Off in the Sale of Intoxicants and Less Drunkenness, However.

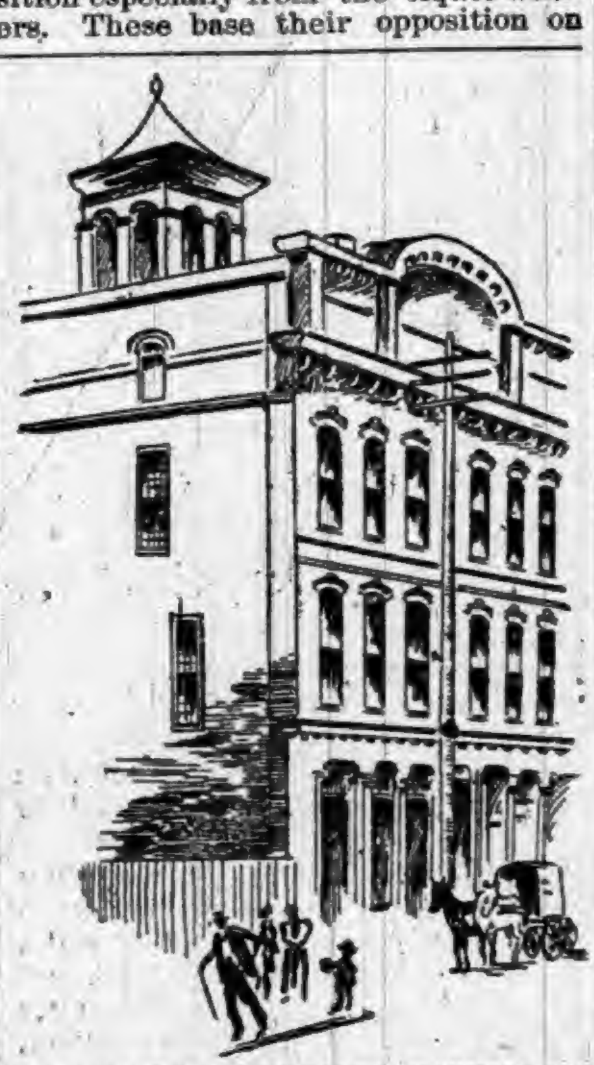
Sold by the State.



GOVERNOR TILLMAN.

According to a dispatch from Columbia, S. C., the greatest excitement prevails there over the State dispensary law. The big government bar-room in Columbia is now in full operation, running twelve hours a day, and turning out on an average from 12,000 to 15,000 flasks per day of whisky of various kinds, as well as gin and other liquors. The State has gone into the business on a big scale, and there is probably not such another large establishment in the country. The building, a cut of which is given, is a large one, situated on Main street just a few yards from the State-house grounds. With the exception of a small office for the railroad commission and an agricultural journal, the building is wholly devoted to the State's whisky enterprise.

The measure recently put in force was carried through by Governor Tillman, and forbids the sale of liquor anywhere except in government dispensaries and by persons appointed by the State. Ever since the law went into operation, it has met with bitter opposition especially from the liquor dealers. These base their opposition on the ground that the State has thus created a monopoly for itself and, secondly, that it cannot engage in trade. The dispensary at Greenville, one of the largest in the State, has been closed by Judge Norton until the law's constitutionality can be determined. The case will be heard in the Circuit Court, and if the law is here declared unconstitutional, similar cases will be opened in all the eight Circuit Courts of the State. But affairs will still, probably, remain unsettled until the Supreme Court can pronounce on the matter.



STATE DISPENSARY BUILDING, COLUMBIA, S. C.

Although there has been less drunkenness and less liquor sold in the State since July 1, yet, financially, the dispensaries have been nearly failures, averaging only from $25 to $45 a day. A large brewing company sent some ale into the State the other day, which is also contrary to the dispensary law, in order to test its legality. Many saloons are in operation on the quiet. The first arrest, made Saturday, under the new law, was that of an Italian, Vincent Chico, of Charleston, for selling beer last week. Three State constables and a dozen spies went to the man's house, searched it from garret to cellar, and confiscated not only liquor but almost everything else they could find. An angry crowd watched the proceedings. Several photographers were present, and the people cried for them to take pictures of the spies. The scene in the police court was equally exciting. The crowd hissed the officers and Chico cursed them, and one drew a revolver against him. Many wealthy citizens offered to go bail for the Italian to any amount.

Other liquor dealers were subsequently arrested. These are only the first of some forty or fifty cases of violation of the law which the constabulary are now working up.

THE SHERMAN LAW.

The Act of Congress Which Is Causing All the Talk.

The Sherman law, about which so much has been said of late, is as follows:

SECTION 1. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to purchase, from time to time, silver bullion to the aggregate amount of 4,500,000 ounces, or so much thereof as may be offered in each month, at the market price thereof, not exceeding $1 for 371.25 grains of pure silver, and to issue in payment of such purchases of silver bullion treasury notes of the United States, to be prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, in such form and of such denominations, not less than $1 nor more than $1,000, as he may prescribe, and a sum to carry into effect the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated out of any money in the treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 2. That the Treasury notes issued in accordance with the provisions of this act shall be redeemable on demand, in coin, at the Treasury of the United States or at the office of any Assistant Treasurer of the United States, and when so redeemed may be reissued, but no greater or less amount of such notes shall be outstanding at any time than the cost of the silver bullion, and the standard silver dollar coined therefrom, then held in the Treasury purchased by such notes; and such Treasury notes shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except where otherwise expressly stipulated in the contract, and shall be receivable for customs, taxes and all public dues, and when so received may be reissued; and such notes when held by any national banking association, may be counted as a part of its lawful reserve. That upon demand of the holder of any of the treasury notes herein provided for, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, under such regulations as he may prescribe, redeem such notes in gold or silver coin, at his discretion, it being the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio, or such as may be provided by law.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall each month coin 2,000,000 ounces of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act into standard silver dollars until the first day of July, 1891, and after that time he shall coin of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act as much as may be necessary to provide for the redemption of the Treasury notes herein provided for, and any gain of seigniorage arising from such coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury.

SEC. 4. That the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of this act shall be subject to the requirements of existing law and regulations of the mint service governing the methods of determining the amount of pure silver contained and the amount and charges or deductions, if any to be made.

SEC. 5. That so much of the act of Feb. 28, 1878, entitled "An act to authorize the coinage of the standard silver dollar and to restore its legal tender character," as requires the monthly purchase and coinage of the same into silver dollars of not less than $2,000,000 nor more than $4,000,000 worth of silver bullion is hereby repealed.

SEC. 6. That upon the passage of this act the balances standing with the Treasurer of the United States to the respective credits of national banks for deposits made to redeem the circulating notes of such banks, and all deposits thereafter received for like purpose, shall be covered into the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt, and the Treasurer of the United States shall redeem from the general cash in the Treasury the circulating notes of said banks which may come into his possession subject to redemption; and upon the certificate of the Comptroller of the Currency that such notes have been received by him and that they have been destroyed and that no new notes will be issued in their place, reimbursements of their amount shall be made to the treasurer, under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, from an appropriation hereby created, to be known as "national bank notes; redemption account," but the provisions of this act shall not apply to the deposits received under Section 3 of the act of June 20, 1874, requiring every national bank to keep in lawful money with the Treasurer of the United States a sum equal to 5 per cent of its circulation, to be held and used for the redemption of its circulating notes, and the balance remaining of the deposits so covered shall at the close of each month be reported on the monthly public debt statement as debt of the United States bearing no interest.

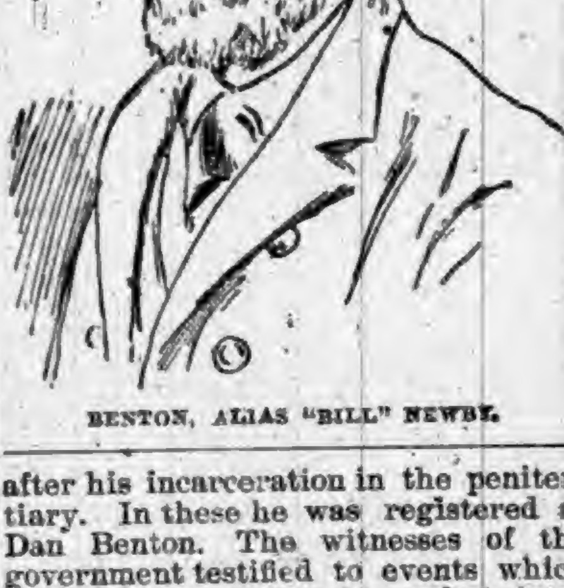
SEC. 7. That this act shall take effect 30 days from and after its passage.

BILL NEWBY GUILTY.

A Springfield Jury Finds that He Is "Rickety Dan" Benton.

The famous suit, involving an alleged pension fraud that would swindle the Government out of $20,000 or more, has been decided at Springfield, Ill., and Bill Newby is declared to be "Rickety Dan" Benton. The case is probably the most remarkable that has ever been tried in the United States. The object of the trial was to determine the identity of a man who claims to be "Bill" Newby, but who the Government is sure is "Dan" Benton. Benton, if that is his name—and the jury says it is—was under criminal indictment for personating Newby in order to procure a pension from the Government. It seems that Bill Newby was a soldier who was supposed for twenty-nine years to have been killed in battle. A short time ago the defendant in this trial put in an application for a pension, claiming that he was Bill Newby, and that, instead of being killed, he had been badly wounded in the head and leg and had been taken to Andersonville prison. There he was known as "Crazy Jack." When in course of time he was released, a demented, "rickety" man, he says he became a wanderer and drifted about the country for a quarter of a century, becoming an inmate of various poor-houses and of the Tennessee penitentiary. Then his reason partially returned and he came to realize that he was Bill Newby. He went out among his old neighbors and declared himself. He recognized old friends and talked in such a manner of old times that he convinced many of them that he was really old Bill. It must be so, they urged, for nobody but Bill Newby would know things he spoke of. Some members of the Newby family, including his old wife, who had long been drawing a pension on his account, received him as genuine. Finally he himself made application for an original pension and then his troubles commenced. An investigation of his case resulted in establishing his identity to the satisfaction of the government officials as "Rickety Dan" Benton and his arrest, indictment, trial and conviction followed.

In opening the case the Government commenced with Dan Benton as a child, after it had shown Bill Newby to be dead and buried. He is traced from White County, Illinois, into Tennessee, where he and his mother were taken by one Andy Wooten. There Dan grew up. He was known to the people of the neighborhood, and so was his mother Lydia. Finally he was sent to the penitentiary at Nashville for horse stealing, and remained there for twelve years. He was Dan Benton, the son of Lydia Benton, and there was no other pretense. Thus it was until 1889, when he left the penitentiary. He was an inmate of many poorhouses in Tennessee, Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, both before and after his incarceration in the penitentiary. In these he was registered as Dan Benton. The witnesses of the government testified to events which succeeded each other in perfect rotation, while those of the defense left a gap of twenty-nine years. They all testified to the identity of the defendant as Bill Newby, but in their descriptions of how Bill Newby looked before the war they varied greatly. The most important witness for the defense was William Cohoon, a soldier and a member of Company E, Fortieth Regiment. He became acquainted with Newby in the army, and on the 4th of April, two days before the battle of Shiloh, stood guard with him for twenty-four hours. While on guard he had a conversation with him which he had never repeated to anybody. After the reappearance of Newby in 1891, the latter, without anything having been said to draw him out, talked about that conversation. The witness was satisfied defendant was Newby.



BENTON, ALIAS "BILL" NEWBY.

Mrs. Newby, 96 years old, believes him her son, and two sisters and a brother testify that he is certainly Bill Newby. Newby, supposed to be dead, never received his discharge from the service, and had he established his claim he would have been entitled to pay during all these years, amounting to about $22,000. The extreme penalty of the law for his offense is fifteen years in the penitentiary. Public sentiment is divided as to the correctness of the verdict and many are bitter in their denunciation of the jury.

FRANTIC CHICAGOANS.

Crowds of Moneyless Excursionists Obliged to Remain in Milwaukee.

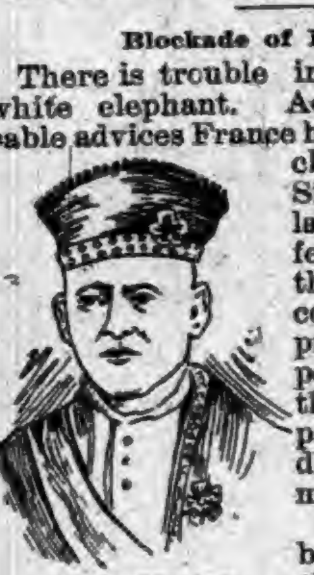
More than 1,000 people were left on the docks at Milwaukee Sunday night who held return tickets when the excursion boats Christopher Columbus, City of Milwaukee, City of Toledo, and Arthur Orr left for Chicago. Each one of the steamers when they arrived was black with people. Vesselmen shuddered at the recklessness shown of human life. Following the boats came the revenue cutter Andy Johnson. Captain Davis had received reports in Chicago of the way the steamers were loaded down, and he slipped his moorings and stood down the lake after them. At Milwaukee the Johnson's men, when the steamer returned home, compelled each to leave when its full quota was aboard, and over a thousand had to remain behind.

WAR IS ALMOST SURE.

FRENCH DEMANDS TOO HEAVY FOR SIAM.

While Many of the Terms of the Ultimatum Are Acceded To, the Most Vital Demand, That of the Concession of Territorial Rights, Is Not Granted.

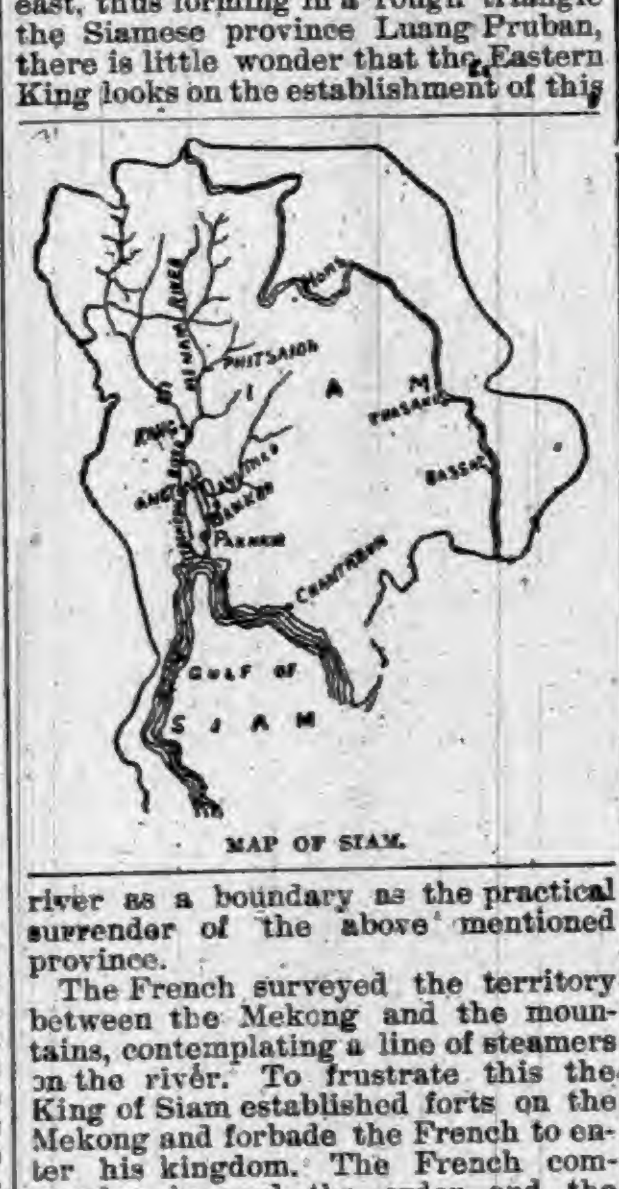
Blockade of Bangkok.



KING OF SIAM.

There is trouble in the land of the white elephant. According to late cable advices France has technically declared war against Siam, and, if England does not interfere, the king of the little Asiatic country will in all probability be compelled to witness the annexation of part of his kingdom to French domains.

The line of boundary is again the cause of dispute. Hitherto a line of mountains lying between the Mekong River and French Annam has been regarded as the western limit of French possession in Asia, but the French it appears have revived an antiquated and obsolete claim set up by the old kingdom of Cambodia, to which their possession in the eastern peninsula formerly belonged, their immediate object of course being to make the Mekong their western boundary, instead of the mountain range which formerly separated them from that river and its fertile valley. If the Mekong was a straight river, the movement on the part of the French could not affect Siam in the least, however objectionable French encroachments might prove to the English colonies on the west of the Mekong, but, considering that further south after entering Siam proper the Mekong makes a detour east, thus forming in a rough triangle the Siamese province Luang Pruban, there is little wonder that the Eastern King looks on the establishment of this river as a boundary as the practical surrender of the above mentioned province.



MAP OF SIAM.

The French surveyed the territory between the Mekong and the mountains, contemplating a line of steamers on the river. To frustrate this the King of Siam established forts on the Mekong and forbade the French to enter his kingdom. The French commander ignored the order and the Siamese killed a French inspector of militia in the upper Mekong river district. Then followed the "crossing of the bar" of the Menam by the French gunboats Inconstante and Comete, and the firing upon them by the Paknam forts. France then gave her ultimatum to Siam, demanding jurisdiction over both banks of the Mekong, an indemnity of 3,000,000 francs, not including that claimed by private parties, and the right, as a guaranty of good faith, to occupy the mouth of the Menam. Failing to accept the principle of this ultimatum within forty-eight hours, Bangkok was to be laid under siege. Siam has made reply to the ultimatum altogether unsatisfactory to France. She considers the demands too heavy, and concedes only the least important of the conditions. His Majesty declares that he will grant but half of the indemnity and territory asked. The French minister retires after declaring the blockade of Bangkok. Advices at the time this is written say that the Siamese warships which are anchored one mile from the French are crowded with men ready for action. Their intention is, in case the French commence hostilities, to steam down and ram the French gunboats, attempt to board them in force, and attack the crews with fixed bayonets. In the event of war being declared England, Russia and China may also become involved.

The blockade of Siam would mean an immense loss to England's commerce, and the concession of the territory demanded by France would establish a French-British frontier in India-China and give France a clear entrance to Southern China, while cutting off China from Siam. The French pretend to see in every move the hand of British intrigue, and while Great Britain has not yet interfered, there is little doubt that she regards French adjacency to her provinces in Upper Burmah with about the same degree of favor as has been evinced by the King of Siam on his own account.

AN UNCONSCIOUS CRIME.

A Story Written for This Paper by William Westall.

CHAPTER I.

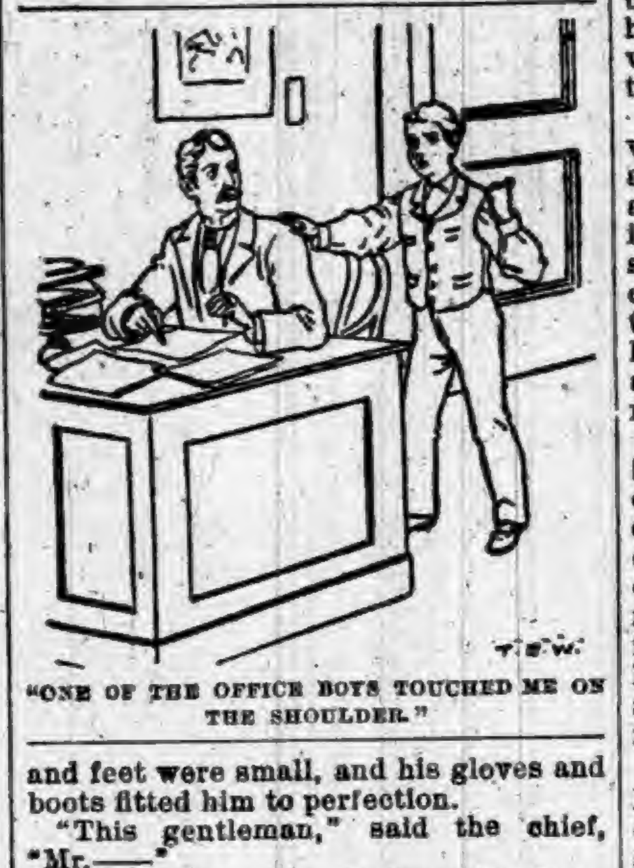
Early in the eighties I was a "sub" on a daily English paper published in Paris. When I say English I merely mean that English was the language in which we wrote and the paper was printed.

One afternoon, as I was busy "faking up" an article about a mysterious murder which the French papers called "The Crime of the Rue du Bac," one of the office boys touched me on the shoulder and said that M. O'Yea, the editor, wanted me in his room.

I laid down my pen and obeyed the summons.

"There is somebody with him," added the boy.

The somebody in question was a man something under 30, short of stature and slightly built, his skin of a pale olive tint, complexion dark; he had a broad forehead, and the general expression of his face was both pleasing and striking. As touching his outward man, he was well dressed, his hands and feet were small, and his gloves and boots fitted him to perfection.



"ONE OF THE OFFICE BOYS TOUCHED ME ON THE SHOULDER."

"This gentleman," said the chief, "Mr.——"

"Thank you. Mr. de Souza has been good enough to bring us some important information about the murder in the Rue du Bac."

"Yes," observed de Souza, "the police have found a clue; perhaps as I was the first to suggest it I may say I found it for them. And by a singular coincidence, and, of course, quite independently, you suggested in yesterday's Chanticleer the very same solution of the mystery. Indeed, your article interested me so much that I thought I would take the liberty of calling to let you know that the police are on the murderer's tracks and will almost certainly lay him by the heels before this time to-morrow."

"We are greatly obliged to you, and I shall make use of the information in the second article on the same subject I am just now writing if you will kindly give me a few details. I suppose you are connected with the police?"

"In a sense. I have long been a student of the psychology of crime. The chief of the detective police is a particular friend of mine, and when he has an interesting case never fails to let me know and I am sometimes able to offer him a valuable suggestion, as in the present instance. Indeed, I think I may call myself an amateur detective."

"Yet you cannot be French, your English is faultless."

"No, I am not French. I am an American from Louisiana, but for the last three years I have lived in Paris. And now for the details."

When de Souza had finished his narrative the chief thanked him warmly and observed that whenever he had anything of interest to communicate we should be glad to hear from him, and would pay for his contributions "at our usual rate."

Whereupon our visitor remarked, smiling, that he hated writing and did not care for money, but that when he heard of aught likely to make "good copy" he would do himself the pleasure of looking in and giving us the facts, which Mr. Davenport (whose articles were always so well done) could put into shape and produce "in his own vivid English."

I bowed in acknowledgment (of course blushing deeply), while O'Yea thanked de Souza even more warmly than before and assured him that the oftener he called the better we should be pleased. A man who could give valuable information and did not care for money was worth cultivating.

A few days afterward de Souza called again, and I accepted an invitation to lunch with him on the following morning, at a cafe in the neighborhood of the Palais Royal, where we had a pleasant time and a long talk.

De Souza had been attracted by my articles and recognized in me a kindred spirit. He was an amateur detective in the sense that the psychology of crime was his favorite study, and he delighted in unravelling complicated cases. The possession of an ample fortune enabled him to follow his bent and he had settled in Paris as being the place best suited to his purpose. Paris is essentially a city of strange crimes. The detective service is, or, at any rate, was then, admirably organized, and French juges d'instruction are probably the best criminal investigators in Europe. With several of them, as also with the heads of the detective police, he was on terms so friendly that whenever they had anything exceptionally interesting afoot they never failed to let him know, and, being a keen analyst as well as a shrewd observer, he was often of great use to them.

But he assured me that his most remarkable discoveries were the result of unconscious cerebration, or, as some people would say, had been made intuitively. After buzzing over a case for several days and giving it up as a bad job, he would go to bed and waken next morning with an idea which put him on the right track.

"But how," I asked, "can cerebration go on during sleep?"

"How do we know what goes on during sleep? Don't people walk and work and do things in their sleep whereof they wot not in their waking moments? So in the hypnotic state, people do things which, when they return to their normal condition, they are unable to recall. And hypnotism, I take it, is a sort of sleep."

At this point the conversation dropped, for I had to go to the office, but de Souza and I met again, and one Saturday night I dined with him at the Hotel Pension Mijoux, in the Champs Elysees, where he had a suite of rooms, and was introduced to his sister, a tall and graceful brunette with black hair; a faint tinge of color showed through the olive tint of her cheeks; her lips were red and full; her nose and the rest of her features simply perfection, and as in those days my acquaintance with pretty girls was decidedly limited and I was as impressionable as any poet, I naturally fell in love with Miss de Souza at first sight. I spent a very pleasant evening, succeeded in hypnotizing de Souza, and left at a very late hour.

CHAPTER II.

A few days afterward I made the usual ceremonial call, and I had the audacity to hope that I should find Miss de Souza alone. I was disappointed, of course. She had a visitor, and, worse still, the visitor was a man.

Through Miss de Souza's introduction, I learned that his name was Delmar, that he was distantly related to her family, and that he had just arrived from New Orleans.

I disliked the fellow from the moment I set eyes on him. He had a hard, cynical, swarthy face, his hair was cut short, his chin and cheeks were closely shaved, his eyebrows square, his eyes deeply set, and his mustaches, a la Victor Emmanuel, were surmounted by a Roman nose. Moreover, he paid marked attention to our hostess and called her by her Christian name. Nevertheless, he was affable and amusing, and as he was civil to me, I was of course obliged to be civil to him.

Presently came de Souza, and after a while we went out and spent an hour at a cafe on the Boulevards, smoking cigarettes, drinking black coffee and talking. The subject was again crime, started, however, by Delmar, apropos of a mysterious murder lately committed in New Orleans, to which the police had been unable to find a clew, and he asked de Souza whether such cases were not infrequent.

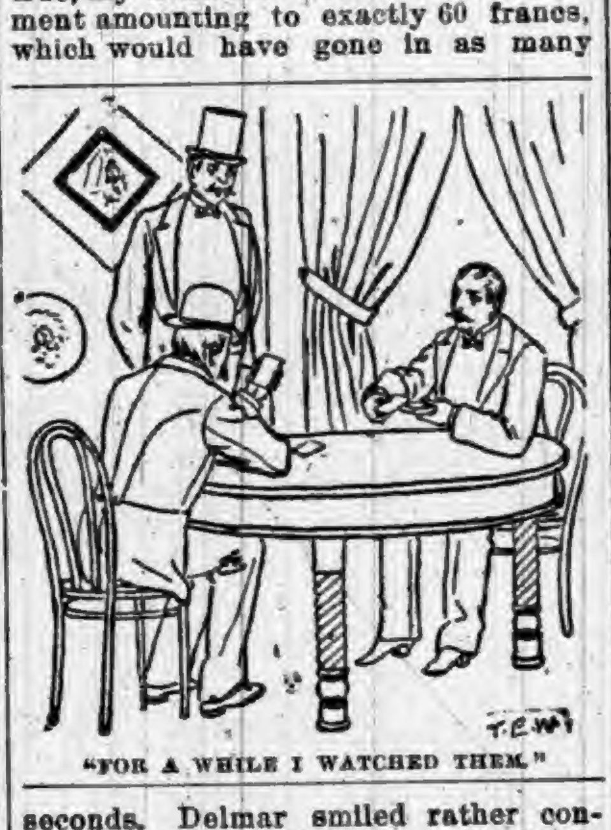
"Certainly, and no wonder," said de Souza. "Murders for the most part can only be proved by circumstantial evidence, which, though generally sufficient, is not always infallible. Direct evidence is seldom forthcoming, and if murderers are not, as a rule, men of impulsive natures or low brain power homicides would be less often detected, and therefore more frequent than they now are."

And then, de Souza having mounted his hobby, gave us an interesting discourse on the idiosyncrasies of assassins and murder as a fine art.

Before we parted Delmar asked us to sup with him at the Cafe Anglais, at whatever hour suited us, and as I had never been inside that famous establishment I accepted the invitation, if not with pleasure, at any rate without hesitation. We agreed to meet at 11, when I should have finished my work at the office, and at 11 precisely I presented myself at the cafe, where I found Delmar and de Souza.

After supper Delmar, who knew Paris better than I knew it myself, took us to a club to which he had the entree.

Delmar proposed poker. I declined on the very sufficient ground that I had no money to lose, and it was literally true, my available assets at that moment amounting to exactly 60 francs, which would have gone in as many seconds. Delmar smiled rather contemptuously, and, turning to de Souza suggested ecarte. De Souza assented, and the two Americans, seating themselves at a vacant table, called for cards. For a while I watched them, and then, growing weary, I betook myself to a roulette table. There, as everywhere else, the play seemed high, judging from the standpoint of a poor devil of a sub-editor. Thousands of francs were continually changing hands. But the facts and gestures of the gamblers interested me more than the vicissitudes of the game. All were in deadly earnest; while some men never changed countenance whatever befell, the faces of others reflected every passing emotion from dull despair and disappointed greed to strained expectation and sordid joy.



"FOR A WHILE I WATCHED THEM."

Never before had I beheld such a display of ignoble passion.

At 2 o'clock de Souza touched me on the shoulder and inquired whether I I were disposed to go home.

"I am quite at your service," I said. "Where is Delmar?"

"Still playing ecarte. He has found another partner."

When we were outside de Souza asked me what I thought of Delmar.

"Frankly?"

"Of course. Tell me without reserve."

"He is good company and can make himself very agreeable. How well he did the honors of the table at supper! A man of strong will, I should say. But there is something in his face that impresses me unfavorably, and, frankly, I don't like him."

"You are right. He has not a good face, and I go a good deal by faces. I am sorry he is come to Paris."

"Is he married?"

"No, I wish he were."

"Why?"

"Because, between ourselves, I am rather afraid he has designs on Marie. Another reason for leaving him, if he does not leave us."

By this time we had reached the Place de la Concorde; and there we went different ways, de Souza going to his hotel, I to my humble quarters on the south side of the Seine.

CHAPTER III.

During the following month I saw less of my friends than usual. I called at the Hotel Mijoux twice without finding Miss de Souza at home. The second time I learned from the concierge that she had gone with Delmar for a drive in the Bois.

A few days later I met de Souza at a cafe, where I sometimes called for a book after leaving the office. He looked worried and out of sorts, but seemed glad to see me.

"If I had not met you to-night," said he, "I should have written. I cannot get anything definite from Delmar. When I inquire how long he means to stay in Paris he evades the question. So I shall quit next week, before worse happens."

"What do you mean?"

"Well, he goes out to that club nearly every night, plays high and almost invariably wins. The other frequenters of the place didn't like it."

"You surely don't think Delmar doesn't play fair?"

"I know nothing about that. Without proof positive I should be sorry to accuse anybody of cheating, but a man who always wins is open to suspicion, and is sure to be hated. One of these nights there will be a row, and I should like to be out of the way when it happens."

"Where shall you go?"

"Haven't made up my mind yet. Come and second breakfast with us in the morning and we will talk about it. I must go now; I promised Marie I would be at home early."

"With pleasure; at what time and where?"

"Eleven, at the Mijoux. We shall be alone; Delmar breakfasts in his own room."

Getting Around a Corner.

A rather shabby but exceedingly cheerful tramp coming down the road asked Mr. Jennings for a job. Mr. Jennings had just set his reaper preparatory to a long day's slow march up and down the wheat field.

"Yes, I have a job. Two dollars a day and board, and it's yours as long as you hold it down. Can you drive?"

"Can I drive? Ain't I druv four harses to wanst fur a big Dutchman in Cheecago, an' Jim screechin' wid a hor-rn on the back stip of the waggin?"

"That's all right. A reaper ain't a tally-ho, but I guess you'll do. You'll have to. Just keep a goin'. I'll be back inside of an hour. But say, I wish you'd save a little patch by the fence in the corner there. I want to try an experiment I read about in the Journal."

"An' how do I work the machine?"

"You let the machine alone. It will work itself. Just you drive straight up to that corner, then turn and go across by the fence. The machine will do the cutting."

The new hand drove a few yards very carefully, then halted, looked at the mysterious thing behind him, and shouted to Mr. Jennings, who had already started to the rescue of his fruit trees:

"And do she kape a-cuttin' like this all the time I kape a-goin'?"

"Yes, yes; go ahead."

"Well, thin, how can I save the bit in the fince corner? Whin I drive up there she'll jist cut it down anyhow, and I won't have nothin' to say about it."

"Why, you idiot! When you get——"

"Av coorse, av coorse! I was jist jokin'. When I git there I'll jist stand still till I git past, and thin I'm all right."

Do You Believe This?

In many a homestead a spider will be allowed to live, as the lord of the manor is convinced that to kill one will surely cause disaster to fall upon himself or family. There is also a superstition, common in many New England States, to the effect that if two persons are walking along hand in hand, and meet with a post or any obstacle which causes them to separate, that the one who passes on the right of it will go to heaven and the other to hell.

Many persons believe that if a rocking-chair should commence to rock of itself, and there be no one in it, there will be a death in the family circle. A needle falling and sticking upright in the floor is supposed to give warning of the approach of a visitor, while a dog sleeping in a room with its nose pointed to the door betokens the death of a dear friend. Cats will, it is believed, suck the breath of sleeping persons, and one should never be left in a room where a baby is sleeping. The tendency to invent these beliefs is fast dying out according to those who have studied the subject, and they give as a reason for this that this is an age of skepticism rather than faith, and that as civilization advances the tendency to investigate all that pertains to the unnatural increases, and that the ease with which the fallacy of most of these old sayings and superstitions is proven deters their growth.

Eight More Lives to Live.

"Hapgood," remarked George W. Best the other afternoon, as he entered his office after luncheon, "you know that song about how the cat came back?"

The amateur photographer, somewhat bewildered at the question, answered that he thought he had heard it, and Mr. Best continued: "Well, I just heard of a tabby which discounts the cat of the song."

"How so?"

"Why, they tried to drown tabby in a big tub of water last night. Tied a brick to her neck, threw her in and this morning—well, they found tabby had swallowed all the water and was sitting on the brick to keep her feet dry."—New York World.

PENSIONERS OF '76.

SIXTEEN VETERANS OF THE REVOLUTION ON THE ROLLS.

Many Well-Known Names Were on the List—Government Bounty Long Drawn Out by June-December Marriages—Bygone Pension Legislation.

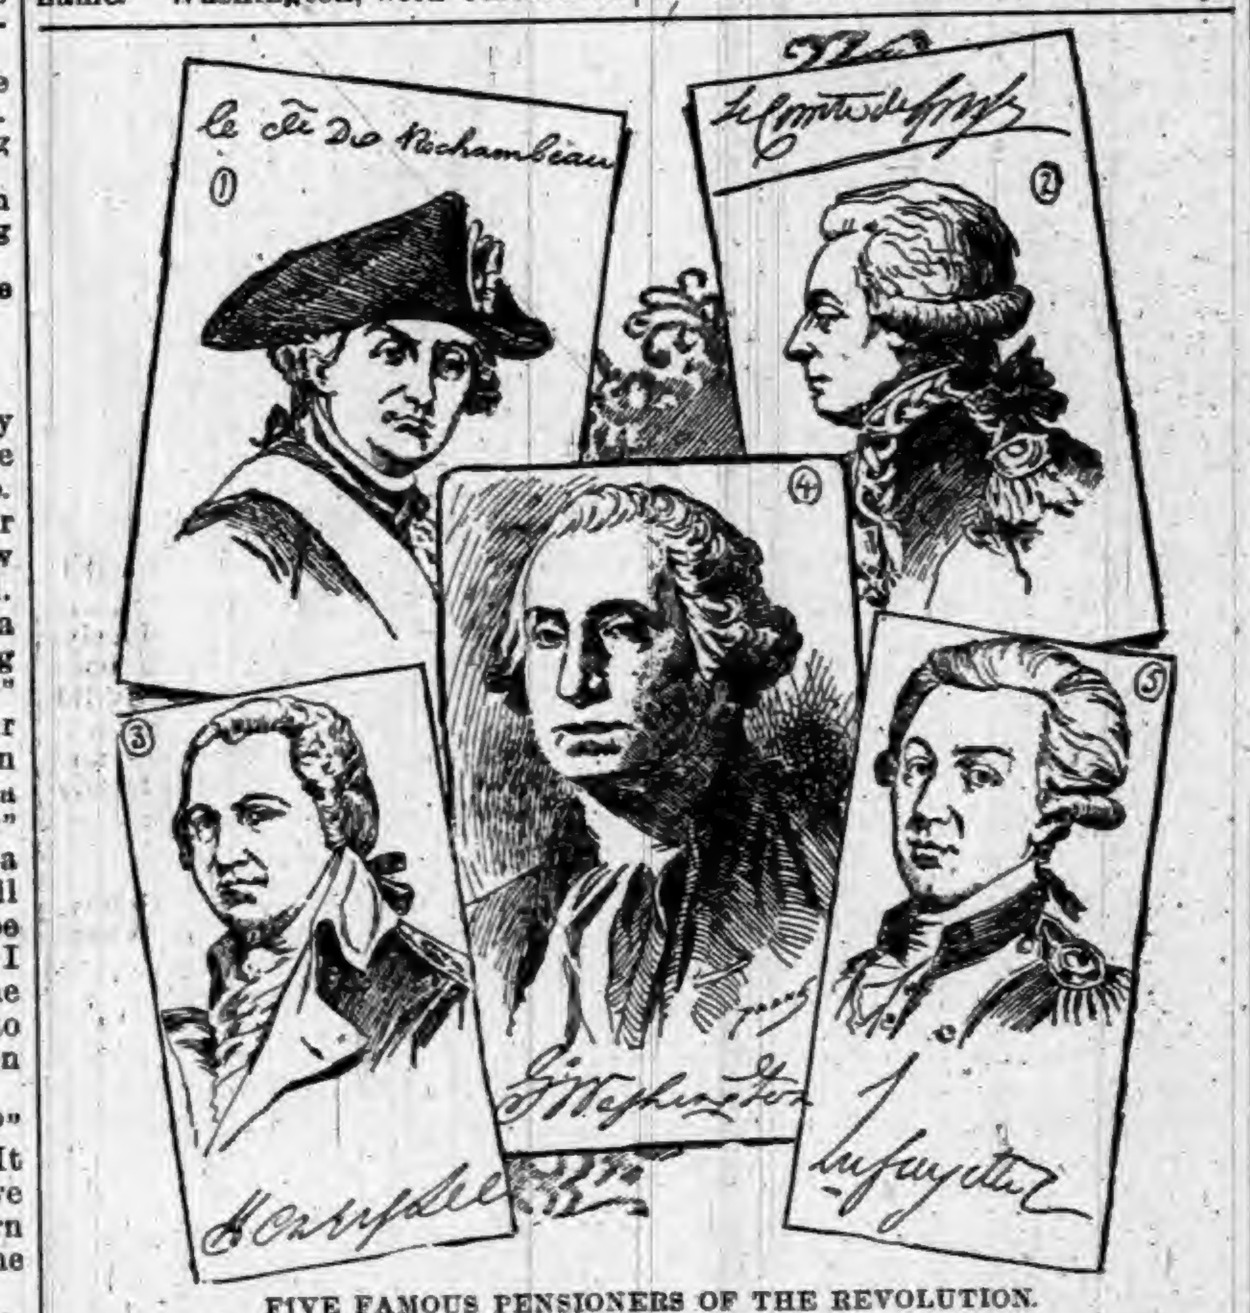
Not in the Flesh But by Proxy.

One by one the few remaining pensioners from the revolutionary war are passing away. In almost every instance these worthy recipients of Government aid have lived to a good old age. Quite recently, says a Washington correspondent, there died at Easton, Pa., a widow whose late husband's pension dated back to the war of independence, to the days of powdered wigs and knee-breeches, and whose own term of years lacked but one of rounding out the century. This lady was Anna Maria Young, the widow of Captain Jacob Young, a revolutionary soldier whom she married in 1816, and with whom she enjoyed the blessings of wedded life for the brief period of six months only. She had, however, enjoyed the pension granted her soldier husband for some seventy-seven years until her death.

To-day there are but sixteen revolutionary veterans on the rolls, and these are not in the flesh. In no case, of course, is the living beneficiary the person to whom the pension was granted. The last actual survivor of the great war, Samuel Downing, died in 1867. As he had drawn a pension for some eighty years, he is probably entitled to hold the national record in this respect.

Well-Known Names on the Rolls.

In glancing over the records, annals and documents dealing with the pensions of the revolution, and with the acts of Congress relative to them, one meets with many a distinguished name. Washington, with records of grants, votes of thanks and presentations; Lee, "Light Horse Harry," and other great sons of the republic, are found side by side with Lafayette, Rochambeau and many another of the brave foreigners whom sympathy with the cause of American independence attracted to this country with offers of assistance. One wonders whether our gentle humorist, C. F. Browne, was aware that his nom de plume, "Artemus Ward," was the real name of one of the major generals of the revolutionary army; and the name of W. Wilmot, captain of the Second Maryland Regiment, who was killed by a foraging party of British on Nov. 4, 1782, at St. John's Island, S. C., reminds us that his was the last blood spilled in the long war.



FIVE FAMOUS PENSIONERS OF THE REVOLUTION.

The first legislation in the interests of the brave soldiers who risked their lives in the struggle to throw off the yoke of foreign domination occurred as far back as 1776. In that year the Continental Congress, recognizing the debt of gratitude owed by the nation to her brave defenders, turned its attention to the subject of military pensions. In a long series of resolutions, passed the 26th of August in that year, it was provided that every officer, both commissioned and noncommissioned, as well as every private soldier, who should in the service of the state receive such injury or disablement as to be rendered incapable for the future of earning his own livelihood, should receive from the public funds during life or a continuance of such injury a pension equal to one-half his monthly pay, such pension to commence from the date that his pay as a soldier ceased. It was also provided that in case the injury should not be so serious as to cause total disablement, the invalid should receive such compensation as might be agreed upon by the legislature of the State in which his residence was located; the compensation never to exceed his half-pay.

This act was supplemented in July, 1836, and again in February, 1848, by the acts extending the payment of pensions, under certain well-defined rules and conditions, to the widows of such soldiers as died in consequence of wounds received or sickness incurred during term of service. A large amount of legislation regulating the subject of pensions was finally brought to a satisfactory conclusion June 7, 1832. It was then enacted that "each of the surviving officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, soldiers and Indian spies, who shall have served in the continental line or State troops, volunteers or militia, for one or more terms a period of two years during the war of the revolution shall receive the amount of his full pay in the said line, according to his rank, such pay to commence from the 4th day of March, 1831, and to continue during his natural life."

Little Chance of Perjury.

Writers in the law periodicals are advocating all sorts of strange doctrines at present. One correspondent thinks that circumstantial evidence should have scarcely any weight. His argument is that when direct evidence is given there is only the perjury of the witness to be guarded against, while in circumstantial evidence there are both the possibility of perjury and the liability to a wrong inference from the circumstances. The strength of circumstantial evidence, according to most writers, however, is that there is little probability of perjury, as the circumstances frequently are slight in themselves and not likely to be distorted by the witnesses who do not know of their full effect. The New York Tribune regards it as probable that many more unjust convictions have taken place from perjured direct evidence than from mistaken inferences from circumstances. Ardemus Stewart, in the American Law Register, belittles the value of expert evidence to an even greater extent than most previous writers. English lawyers, writing to the London papers, have advocated to some extent a strange plan for doing away with all oaths in legal proceedings, on the ground that perjury is so common that simple declarations to which the same penalties for incorrect statements might attach, would be just as valuable as testimony given under the present form. Another new theory which has found its advocate is that in criminal trials, except for treason, the defense, as well as the prosecution, shall be conducted by public officials. This suggestion is rather more startling than any of the others, and is even more unlikely than they of adoption. It may be that in the superabundance of law periodicals writers find it easier to invent a theory than to make some valuable contributions to legal literature.

Conservative Corea.

Though Corea, the hermit kingdom, has been for several years open to all who wish to enter it, its opening has not yet proved of much importance to the outside world. It has been exploited by various adventurers, but their schemes have come to naught. A postal service was established, but it existed only for one day. The Corean mint has not yet succeeded in producing a Corean coinage. Several of the colonies boomed Corea as a mission field, and sent out so many agents, that in some places they were metaphorically treading on each other's heels. But Corea has not yet been turned into a paradise, the missionaries are still more numerous than their converts, and some of the societies which foolishly expected that a lavish expenditure would produce an instantaneous reformation are now as foolishly recalling their agents and giving up the enterprise.—Correspondence Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

The World's Wheat Eaters.

The Department of Agriculture gives the following interesting statistics of populations in different countries, as estimated for May of the present year, and also the annual per capita consumption of wheat in each country in bushels:

	Population May, 1893.	Consumption per capita.
United Kingdom	39,500,000	6.11
France	38,500,000	9.18
Italy	30,800,000	4.80
Belgium	6,250,000	6.46
Germany	50,500,000	2.24
Netherlands	4,700,000	3.86
Switzerland	3,000,000	4.80
Spain	18,000,000	4.70
Greece	2,260,000	4.90
Sweden and Norway	6,800,000	1.26
Portugal	5,300,000	2.10
Turkey in Europe	4,900,000	5.30
Denmark	2,260,000	2.16
Bosnia	2,100,000	2.00
South Africa	2,300,000	2.85
Japan	41,200,000	2.70
United States	67,000,000	6.62
Russia, all	120,000,000	1.73
India	290,000,000	0.70
Roumania	5,600,000	4.80
Austria-Hungary	42,400,000	3.64
Bulgaria	3,300,000	6.66
Servia	2,200,000	2.20
Argentina	4,800,000	5.20
Chile	2,870,000	4.60
Uruguay	700,000	5.50
Australasia	4,000,000	7.75
Canada	4,900,000	8.10
Algeria	4,200,000	4.50

It will be seen from the above tables that the French people consume most wheat, and the people of India the least. After the French come the Canadians, Australasians, Bulgarians, Belgians, English and Americans, in order named.

In explanation of the comparatively low average American consumption of wheat it may be said that the people of the middle West and throughout the South consume a vast amount of corn; not so much by reason of its greater cheapness perhaps, as from inclination and habit. Primarily, corn was the food of the negro population in the days of slavery owing to its lesser cost, and the negro cooks in white families no doubt were instrumental in introducing the palatable corn "pone" and other creations of like sort to the tables of the average Southern planter. This custom still prevails throughout the South and has gained also a strong foothold in some of the Mississippi Valley States, thus reducing below several other countries our per capita consumption of wheat.

"Immortal J. N."

Last week there were reports that J. N. Free, the "Immortal J. N.," was dead. It now appears this was not so. But it will be of interest to our people who know him so well to read the following item from the Lima (Ohio) Times of July 15:

A dispatch says that J. N. Free, the philosopher, is on his death bed and will have no use for his railroad passes in a short time. Free was known all over the country as the "Immortal J. N." and it was only of late years that he changed his name to "J. N. the Philosopher." In the early days this peculiar character made semi-annual visits to Lima, but of late he seldom came among us "to lift the veil and remove the pressure." Free is an Ohioan by birth and when the war broke out he left the law practice and went to the front as a newspaper correspondent He was a man of much learning and always believed the war could have been averted and the same results attained without the loss of so many lives. He said both sides were to blame and that the great conflict was nothing but a national murder. Before the war had finished Free's mind was dethroned, yet he followed the armies about over the country and was an eye witness to many of the great battles. When Jeff Davis was captured and thrown into prison J. N. went to interview the rebel chieftain. Other reporters tried the same thing, but none of them succeeded. J. N. never failed. He said he had a commission from Christ to see Jeff Davis and after a short parley the philosopher was admitted to the prison. He at once proceeded to lecture the confederate president, and give him a tongue lashing for the part he played in the war. Free was ejected from the prison, but he enjoyed the distinction of being the only man who had been able to interview the dethroned president of the southern confederacy while that personage was a prisoner. At the close of the war Free came north and traveled from Maine to California. He never paid any railroad fare or hotel bills Every railroad in the country fell victims to his wiles, and today J. N has more railroad passes than were ever owned by Jay Gould. He is known to every conductor in the country and he could ride across the continent a hundred times without being asked for a ticket. All of his passes are good during his life and he is never bothered about getting them renewed.

THE AUBURN COURIER

OFFICIAL PAPER OF DeKALB COUNTY.

JAMES A. BARNS, Editor.

Registered at the Auburn, Indiana, post-office as second-class matter.

THURSDAY............JULY 27, 1893

MINERS in Colorado are said to be in desperate straits, as some silver mines have shut down.

MANY banks in Colorado and Kansas were forced to close last week. They are wealthy and will likely be all right soon.

RIOTING last week in the Kansas coal mining districts. Those who had gone out on a strike, tried to prevent others from working.

FRANCE is again trying to get into a fight with Siam. It will give her an excuse to annex some more territory from a weak country.

REPORTS from the west and northwest, are that it is getting too dry for the corn crop. But here in northern Indiana, we seem to be all right.

THE Hudson World shows its good taste when it copies a good financial item from the COURIER. But it forgets one important little point—namely "Auburn Courier" plainly printed at the beginning or the end of the article.

PEOPLE who have nothing more valuable to do, are hunting up presidential candidates for '96. The professional candidate inventor is becoming a bore. Wait till the time comes, and then ask the people to select a man. If this were done in all cases, from great offices to small ones, the people's interests would be better looked after.

THE Churubusco Truth is advertising some of its ambitious citizens who wanted office and had the Truth publish their names as candidates, and then utterly "forgot" to pay for it. Oh, Bro. Truth, you shouldn't mind a little thing like that. In the twelve or fifteen years we have published a paper, there have been candidates of all sorts published in the COURIER, and so many of them forgot to pay, that if all were to come forward now and whack up, we could start such a bank that the whole country might "run" on for months and not faze it. Candidates as a rule have very defective memories—especially after election.

WE PUBLISH to-day the usual statement of the First National Bank of Auburn, showing its condition on three different dates, namely, May 4, July 12 and July 26. These figures show a continually improving condition. The second date given is for the day next after the Davis failure. It will be noticed that the cash on hand has increased about $9,000, and on July 3, the usual semi annual dividend of 5 per cent was made the stockholders. Other conditions have steadily improved in spite of the strain of hard times. We understand that this condition of steady improvement is the rule all over the country. Business men will be pleased to note this and will find this combined statement full of interest.

PROF. S. S. GORBY, State Geologist, has unfortunately taken to drinking and recently disgraced himself by getting drunk and abusing his family. There should be passed a law compelling a public officer who got drunk, to go and take the Keeley cure and have the expense taken out of the first quarter of his salary. Or, what is better, the people should look more carefully into the character of the men they nominate for office, high or low. We have seen several men nominated for a county office, who were known to be drinking men, when it was also well known that others seeking the same place were not. And we have seen such a person win at an election when the man on the other ticket was free from any such fault. Possibly, now that we stop to think about it, it is the careless people who are to blame for getting us bad officers.

THE Hudson World says it admires the stand we have taken on the money question, because we "now favor more greenbacks." Our brother must not, however, be misled. We are not as he seems to think, a new convert to some of the new financial vagaries now afloat or trying to float. But we have always held that our paper money should be greenbacks. Yet we do not wish to be classed as some greenbackers justly are, as having any extreme or wild view on these questions. We believe the government would have saved several hundred millions of the people's money, had it taken the proper course, and the people themselves would have saved a great many times as much as the government did. But we are not prepared to say that an unlimited amount of money is all we need to secure prosperity. We are one of those who believe "we have as much money now as ever." What we need is to make our money more nearly uniform, and to secure for it greater independence from manipulation by wealthy combinations.

In the Cave of the Winds.

Luna Island and the center Fall overhang the Cave of the Winds, which on the return to Goat Island is reached by the Biddle Stairs, one of the old land marks of the place. The Cave of the Winds, to my thinking, gives the most thrilling experience of the trip, and is well worth the trouble of donning a "cave" suit and making the long descent of the winding stairs. These stairs are free for the use of the public, but one dollar is charged for the costume and guide for the cave. At frequent intervals small parties of the most grotesque figures emerge from the pavilion on the bluff, clad in a weird combination of rubber coats, flannel bloomers, and felt slippers, and, after winding down the declivity, follow a narrow footpath to the very edge of the American Fall. Here the guide takes command and leads the way over a fragile wooden staircase strung from rock to rock in the very face of the torrent. The spray eddies and whirls about the queer figures, often dashing over them with a blinding force; but, with the sun at a right angle, a rain bow in a perfect circle dances along in front, forming one of the rarest and most beatiful of natural phenomena. The narrow wooded path soon disappears beneath the Fall, and it is a breathless moment, when, following the guide along the rocky ledge, it seems as if all Niagara must be upon us. The passage under the Falls is quickly accomplished, and the venturesome explorers soon emerge, dripping and out of breath, but with an absolutely novel sensation to their credit. The trip seems fraught with danger, but with a guide and ordinary care it is quite safe; accidents at the Cave of the Winds being a rare occurence. After once more reaching the pavilion on the bluff, and resuming one's proper rainment, visitors are presented with a highly ornamental certificate, testifying to the fact of their visit.—From "A Day at Niagara," in Demorest's Family Magazine for August.

His success in the treatment of piles can be amply attested by hundreds whom he cured during his former visits. I can cure any case of piles, no matter of how long standing, or how hopeless the case may be. The patient suffers no pain or inconvenience. In most cases one treatment is sufficient, which takes only a few minutes, and the time required for a cure is about two weeks, during which time the patient is not inconvenienced from business. 20tf

The negro barber who was bitten in a fight last week, is getting along well. Dr. Buchtel fixed up the wound, and thinks it will not disfigure him, as only a small piece was torn from his lip. The biter has skipped out. The two darkies had quarreled about something.

Gillis & Co have put in a large patent refrigerator at their meat market which will add greatly to their facilities for keeping their meats sweet and fresh. They expect also to keep on hand at all times a supply of good country butter. This will be good news to housekeepers.

Monday about 11.30 a. m. an alarm of fire was given. It was the dry kiln at the Church Furniture Factory. The fire department was on hand in a short time, but it took them some time to put out the fire, owing to the fact that the kiln was full of lumber which rendered it very difficult to reach with water. We did not learn the damage but we believe it was not heavy.

Mrs. Hoffman, wife of Prof. H. A. Hoffman of the State University, accompanied by her cousin, Miss Hoffman, who resides at the family home near town was here yesterday. The former was starting on her return journey. We are sorry that our better half's absence in Chicago prevented a very pleasant meeting, when the two ladies called. We hope to be more fortunate at some future day.

There was another case of "provoke" in Squire Walborn's court last Saturday. Ross McKinley down in Jackson had sassed a young man named Newt. Donaldson, and the latter had him arrested. It wasted a day for the whole neighborhood to come up here in a busy time, and to an outsider looked like a small matter to go to law about. It was the outcome of the old quarrel in the U. B. church.

The first new wheat sold in Auburn this season was brought in by J. B. Roberts last Friday, and purchased by L. J. Miller. It was raised on James McClellan's field where "gas well No. 3" is situated. The yield was 32½ bushels to the acre, and Mr. Miller says the quality was the finest he had seen for a long time. It is also plain that a supply of natural gas 1,900 feet below the surface does not affect a crop at the top. Who says DeKalb soil won't raise a double crop?

C. W. Kaley and wife spent part of last week at St. Joe visiting the relatives there. At present they are at Lakeside, Ohio, where Mrs. Kaley's father, J. P. Widney, resides. After their visit there, they will return and from here go to Chicago for another visit to the fair. Though they were so unfortunate as to lose several hundred dollars in the fire at the hotel where they stopped at Chicago when there before, they will go there for another week or two.

The Colored Evangelist Association, under the direction of Elder Wm. Reidley, of Nashville, Tenn., are holding a nine-days camp meeting in Terry's grove, St. Johns, closing Sunday, July 30. These meetings are interesting and largely attended. Sunday evening the "Fall of Jericho" will be presented. An admission fee of 10 cents is charged at the gate. All ministers and their congregations are invited to attend. Billy Bradshaw, so long in the employ of W. H. Kiblinger, is with the company.

F. A. Borst, manager of the Auburn band, reports a grand time at Ashley last Friday, at the organization of the lodge of Knights of Pythias. There were about 400 at the banquet which was an immense affair, and on a most elaborate scale. The lodge starts out with 70 members and a prospect that this will soon be increased. The banquet was in a large tent provided for the occasion. Mr. Borst speaks enthusiastically of the meeting and especially of the good work done by Mr. Strayer, Mr. Gary and Dr. Burgess. The order of the K. of P. bids fair to capture the country up there.

Prof. C. E. Kriebel, so favorably known as principal of the Butler schools, has associated himself with the Northwestern Normal College at Wauseon, where he becomes associate principal. His well known ability and popularity will put new life into that excellent institution.

'Squire Walborn is the most popular justice of the peace in this section, if we are to judge by the way people bring their cases before him from all over the county. He is proving himself able, courteous and dignified and has, for a justice of the peace, a pretty fair knowledge of the law. With good judgment this makes him a valuable officer. One seldom hears a complaint about him or his rulings.

Last fall I was taken with a kind of summer complaint, accompanied with a wonderful diarrhea. Soon after my wife's sister, who lives with us, was taken the same way. We used almost everything without benefit. Then I said, let us try Chamberlain's colic, cholera and diarrhea remedy, which we did, and that cured us right away. I think much of it, as it did for me what it was recommended to do. John Hertzler, Bethel, Berks county, Pa. 25 and 50 cent bottles for sale by Robbins & McCord.

The Two Bands Consolidated.

Last Thursday the two bands effected a consolidation. We now have the finest as well as the largest band in this section of the country. It will be known as the Auburn Military band. This is a move in the right direction. The place is not large enough to give the two bands the support they deserve. The following efficient officers were elected, and under their management there is no reason why Auburn should not have the finest band in the state.

This will be the last meeting of the battalion before the encampment. It is earnestly requested that every comrade be present. Good speakers will be on hand and a pleasant time is anticipated.

Gunsaulus, president of the Armour Institute of Chicago, and pastor of the First Presbyterian church, and Rev. A. A. Willits, D. D., pastor of the First Presbyterian church of Dayton, Ohio. Rev. Miss Henrietta G. Moore, of Springfield, Ohio, will give a temperance lecture or sermon on Tuesday evening.

Queer Oil Wells.

There used to be a curious oil well in Venango county, Pa., which never yielded a drop of oil except on Sunday, to the great grief of the Sabbatarians. But there is a well in Wheeler canyon, California, known as the Lunatic oil spring, which is quite as curious. When the new moon appears it begins to flow oil, and the flow increases in volume as the moon grows. When the moon is full the spring yields three barrels a day. When the moon reaches its last quarter the flow ceases.

WINE OF CARDUI, a Tonic for Women.

Bishop & Lackey.

As noted last week, there was an important change of firm. The well known store of W. P. Harter & Co. was sold by the administrator, Albert Robbins, to ex-clerk, Geo. A. Bishop, and G. W. Lackey, a leading merchant of Garrett, who will conduct the business under the firm name of Bishop & Lackey. But the store and business will be known as "Harter's," a name intimately associated with one of the most popular and successful business houses Auburn ever had. Ever since Mr. Harter's death our people had felt a lively and quite natural interest in the coming change. They almost felt as if it was a matter personal to each, that "Harter's" should be owned and managed by some one who was not only well known but popular also. Then came a fear that some cheap John of a stranger with more money than business capacity, would get the establishment and lead it back into some old rut. But when, last week, it was announced that Mr. Bishop and Mr. Lackey were the coming new owners there was rejoicing all along the line. Not only were their most numerous customers, the lady patrons pleased, but the solid and conservative business men were satisfied. Even those who are sure to come more or less into competition in similar lines, feel that it is always more satisfactory to have for rivals, men who will be honorable and agreeable as competitors. So we have talked extensively with our people, and feel sure that though feeling they had no right to dictate, yet it has come as nearly as possible just as they would have fixed it, had the choice been theirs. So we feel sure the new firm of Bishop & Lackey starts out on a sure course of popularity and consequent prosperity.

AT best, life is not very long. A few more smiles, a few more tears, some pleasure, much pain, sunshine, and songs, clouds and darkness, hasty greetings, abrupt farewells—then our little play will close, and injurer and injured will pass away. Is it worth while to hate each other?

ONE cheerful face in a household will keep everything bright and warm within. Envy, hatred, malice, selfishness, despondency, and a host of evil passions, may lurk around the door, they may even look within, but they can never enter and abide there; the cheerful face will put them to shame and flight.

SOME notion of the vastness of the Western forests may be had from the fact that a new logging camp just established at the headwaters of the Skagit River, in Washington, is under contract to turn out an average of about a million feet every month. Five camps on the Skagit will turn out twenty-five million feet of fir-logs alone this year.

THE war lord of Germany is a kind and indulgent parent. He is anxious to stir the martial order of his sons, and has had made for them as a toy a model steel fortress, at a cost of 1,000,000 marks. Probably had his Royal War Lordship been obliged to make his marks by labor a plain company of tin soldiers would have accomplished his object.

COURIER-JOURNAL: A play has been written which is described as a "captivating narration to please and edify refined audiences." One of its grand climaxes, we are promised, is to be a real fight between dogs, coons, and wild cats in a safe cage. Why does not some enterprising dramatist incorporate in his play a real session of the Kentucky Legislature in a safe cage?

OFFICIAL STATISTICS show that the dairy exports of the United States have decreased during the past decade, though butter has improved a little since 1887 and 1888. The exports of cheese have steadily decreased, and are less than one-half in value what they were in 1881 and 1882. Exports of imitation butter and also oil have increased very materially.

TO ATTAIN to a generous courtesy, more even than good-sense and good-nature is necessary; some self-denial must be practiced, not with a view of obtaining services in return, as some cynics would have us believe, but because a handsome courtesy surely is twice blessed, breeding in return that reciprocal kindness which we concieve of as governing the behavior of the angels themselves.

THE School Board at St. Louis must be run by old bachelors. They have recently dismissed every married woman teacher. They evidently think that as soon as a woman is married she either loses her mind, or at least is incapacitated for the government of children. St. Louis should imitate some other cities and put a few brainy, clear-headed women on the school board in place of her bald-headed bachelors.

MR. ROBERT LINCOLN is reported to have said that it cost him $70,000 more than his salary to represent the United States as Minister to England. If this is true there is something wrong. Either the salaries of our ministers abroad are grossly inadequate or some of these ministers are accustomed to live in a style out of keeping with the Democratic character of the country they represent. The matter ought to be investigated by Congress, and the wrong, whatever it may be, righted.

THE killing of Emin Pasha by violence is in defiance of a long line of precedents. Emin has heretofore evinced a preference for death in some less crudely disagreeable form, his choice being smallpox in a majority of instances of his perishing from the earth, although he has favored fever on occasions, and seemed not averse to the blandishments of starvation. But inured as he is to dying, it was not believed that Emin would ever consent to be sent hence by an untutored brunet from the center of Afric darkness.

AT the meeting of the National Academy of Science in Washington, D. C., Prof. Alex. Graham Bell gave an interesting description of Helen Kellar, the Alabama marvel. This wonderful girl was, by an unfortunate illness in childhood, rendered deaf, dumb, and blind. Nevertheless although now only thirteen years of age, she has accomplished wonders in the way of overcoming her difficulties. Specimens of her handwriting and original stories and poems were presented by Mr. Bell, who said that the girl was recovering her power of speech, and was, indeed, a prodigy.

AN English magazine lately offered a prize for the best answer to the question, "What kind of a man does a woman most admire?" The answers vary widely. The one which took the prize has, among the requisites of the ideal, the following: "The man must interest by uncommonness, either in appearance or manner; or he must have the indescribable quality called charm. He must know his own mind and steadily work thereto, even to masterfulness. He disregards 'they say,' and is not one of a herd. His friends are men—not women. He is only once deceived by the same person. His, perhaps, hasty temper never runs to unkindness. He has not the abiding peace of commonplaceness. He needs sympathy and solace in a sometimes divine discontent. He abides under no failure, but goes on. His occasional want of success only attaches and rivets his determination."

THE Massachusetts Legislature has taken one more step toward having good roads and pavements by passing a bill requiring wide tires on the wheels of draft wagons. After August 1, 1896, every wagon in Massachusetts used for carrying heavy loads must have tires from three to five inches wide, according to the weight of the load it is to carry. This step is as important as the building of good country roads and the construction of improved city pavements. Neither of these can be maintained if the old-fashioned narrow tire is to remain in use. It will cut and grind the best road and pavement to ruin. Much has been done toward working up a public sentiment in favor of improved roads. The next five or six years are likely to see the good results of this agitation. But all this advance will be lost in a short time if the present style of wagon tire continues to be used. The reform should be made thorough while it is under way.

Church Money.

It is said that the people of New Zealand look down upon copper coins and will never use them if they can help it. An English clergyman who had one day taken the place of another preacher in Auckland says that in the collection of something over eight pounds there were 256 three-penny pieces and only four coppers.

It is so well understood that these smaller silver coins will be used in church collections, that the three-penny pieces have received a name.

One day a young lady wanted some small change from a Chinaman, who was the family grocer, and he drew out a handful of coppers.

"Oh, no, I don't want that!" she said.

"Ah, I see what missey wants," said he. "Churchy moneyll' And he handed over a quantity of three-penny pieces.

Too Much for Him.

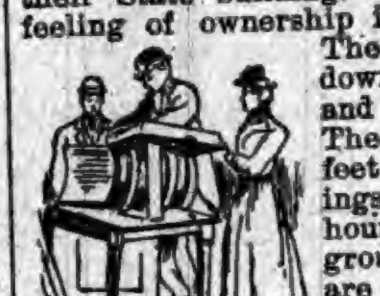
IN STATE BUILDINGS.

WHERE OLD FRIENDS MEET AT THE WORLD'S FAIR.

Visitors Crowd Around the Huge Registers and Look for Acquaintances from Home —A Latter-Day Evangeline—Florida's Lament—The Model Farm.

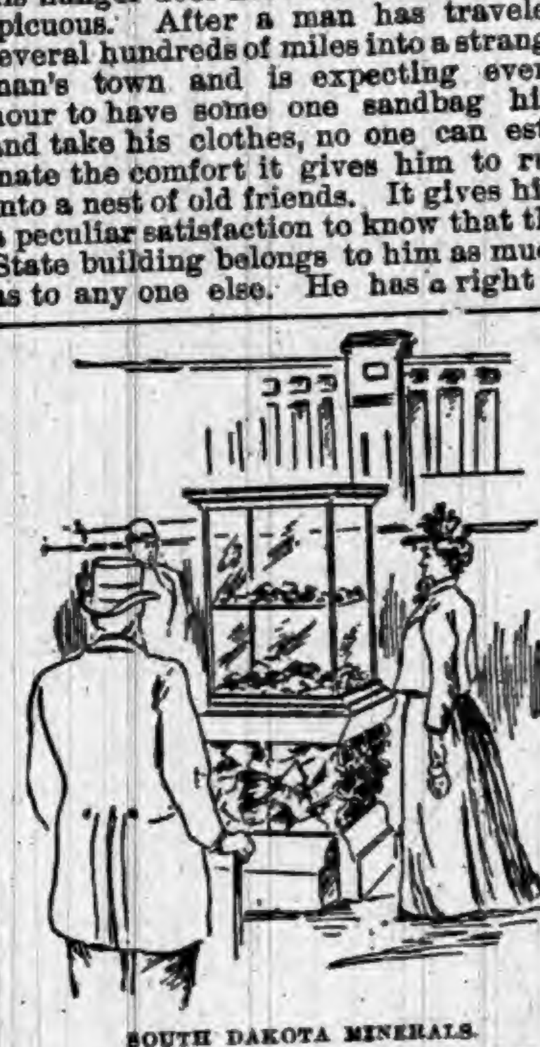
A Tour of the States.

World's Fair correspondence:

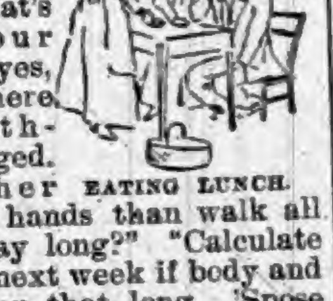


A BIG REGISTER.

The people take great satisfaction in their State building. They show the feeling of ownership in many ways. The women drop down upon the sofas and go to sleep. The men put their feet upon the railings. At every hour in the day groups of lunchers are on the porches, And they spread out their pickles and pie without any of that furtive looking and apparent apprehension of interference with some rule. The State building is the one place where the Columbian guard with his hanger does not make himself conspicuous. After a man has traveled several hundreds of miles into a strange man's town and is expecting every hour to have some one sandbag him and take his clothes, no one can estimate the comfort it gives him to run into a nest of old friends. It gives him a peculiar satisfaction to know that the State building belongs to him as much as to any one else. He has a right to take a nap on the sofa or sit tilted back on the veranda all day long. Then when he looks in the register and finds that other people from his county are in town it takes away that lonesome feeling. Maybe he will bump into an acquaintance as soon as he enters the front door. If he does, you will hear something after the following: "Well! what in the world are you doin' here?" "I swan, is that you? What are you doin' here?" "Oh-h-h, we had to see the Fair; couldn't miss, it you know, not if it took a leg." "That's right, that's right. Bring your folks?" "Oh, yes, they're around here somewhere. Mother's about fagged. Says she'd rather cook for harvest hands than walk all day. Goin' to stay long?" "Calculate on bein' here all next week if body and soul stick together that long. 'Spose you'll be here some time." "Can't tell yet. Just about give up seeing it all. Half the time don't know whether I'm on my head or my heels. Blamedest place I ever struck." "That's right, that's right."



SOUTH DAKOTA MINERALS.

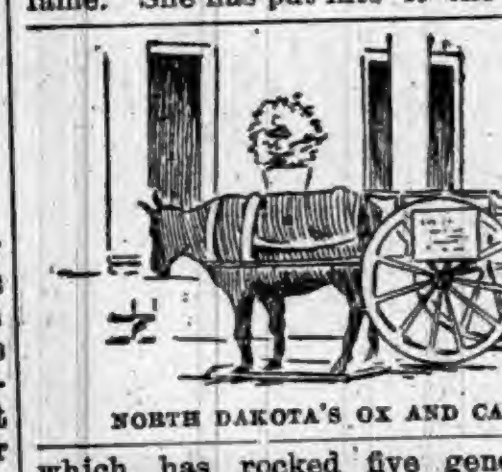


EATING LUNCH.

State Products Exhibited.

"Corn is King! Sugar is Queen!" Nebraska displays this double motto on her building to call attention to the fact that she still persists in the practicability of a beet sugar industry. Kansas makes little boast of sorghum sugar, but Nebraska is as confident as ever about the beet experiment. Not only are samples of beet sugar shown, but the process of extracting it is illustrated. In Nebraska's building is a detail map of Platte County, made by sticking wheat, oats, rye and grass seed in a large board. The Western States emphasize their specialty in production. You can smell when you come within five rods of North Dakota. The moment you cross the threshold you experience an overpowering sense of "No. 1 hard." Wheat is everywhere. The custodian says there are 146 varieties of wheat in the North Dakota building. Nobody will dispute him. The State of Washington makes oats almost as conspicuous as North Dakota does wheat.

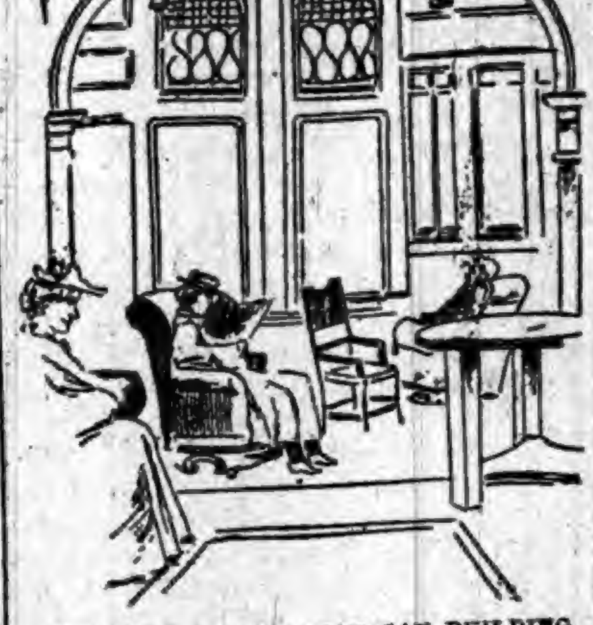
Everybody who goes to the national capital visits Mount Vernon. And everybody who comes to the Fair wants to see the Virginia Building, which is a copy of the home of Washington. The reproduction is as faithful as that of the Chinese artist who put a tear and a grease spot on the new coat which was to be "exactly like the old one" left with him for measurement. Even the hole for the cat in the door of Mrs. Washington's room, where the mother of her country locked herself up when she desired solitude, has not been forgotten. Massachusetts, too, goes in for the historical in her State building. She has copied the home of John Hancock, of Declaration of Independence fame. She has put into it the cradle which has rocked five generations of Adamses, from which came two Presidents, the mirror in which Governor Hutchinson surveyed his powdered wig 150 years ago, and the desk Gen. George Washington used at Cambridge. From an upper window of Louisiana a live Evangeline, as she cards the cotton and spins the string, looks down upon Hiawatha in plaster before the Minnesota Building. The hat that Zachary Taylor wore and the camp chest that went with him through the Mexican war are among the Louisiana curiosities, and with them are pieces of furniture which the Spanish governors used when Louisiana extended away up the Mississippi Valley and included Missouri. Louisiana calls attention to her resources in a way that shows the changes time is working. She impresses not her sugar industry, not her cotton, but her rock salt, her cypress, and most of all the splendid quality for inside finishing of her curly leaf pine.



NORTH DAKOTA'S OX AND CART.

Model Farms.

Model farms are centers of attraction in several of the State buildings. Washington has one of them which is 30 feet square, with a farmhouse no larger than a bird-cage, a red barn 3 feet high, and flowing wells which spout into troughs that hold about a pint. Fields of grain are represented by millet heads stuck in the loose earth. A thrashing machine 8 inches high is being operated by farmers 5 inches tall. There are reapers and mowers in miniature, pastures, cows, and country roads, all shown with considerable accuracy. To many visitors this dwarf farm is a triumph of the Exposition. City people look at the model and thing what fun farming must be. Country folks wonder where the weeds are and what farm was ever in such apple-pie order.



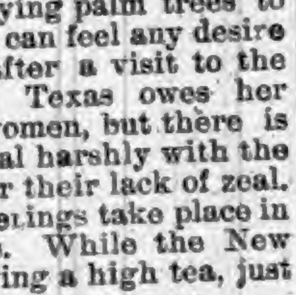
A CORNER IN THE MICHIGAN BUILDING.

In front of the North Dakota Building is a stuffed ox, harnessed to a weather-beaten cart, with big lumbering wheels. On the card it says:

> This outfit was owned by the Hudson Bay Company and represents the only means of travel and transportation employed north and west of St. Paul prior to the year 1871.

What makes this card interesting is the fact that in 1893 the good people of the Dakotas are coming to the Exposition in through sleepers, with a colored boy to make up their berths. South Dakota has a model of a miner's cabin, a mine and a quartz mill, the work of a Black Hills boy 14 years old.

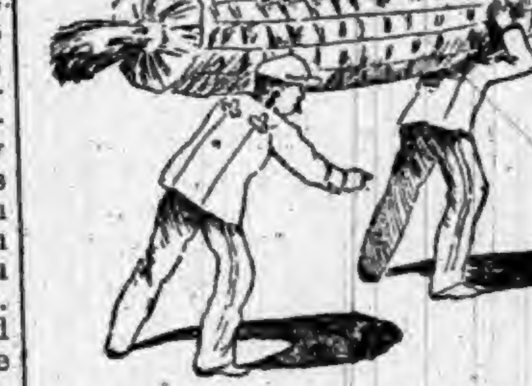
Some State Legislatures from mistaken motives refused to appropriate money for building or for exhibits. In several instances the citizens of those States have put their hands in their pockets and made good the lack of State pride in their law-makers. Such movements in Arkansas and Texas have resulted well. Florida is the lonesome exception. Florida has almost nothing but the walls of her building and some dying palm trees to show. Few people can feel any desire to go to Florida after a visit to the Florida Building. Texas owes her building to Texas women, but there is no disposition to deal harshly with the men of the State for their lack of zeal.



READING THE HOME PAPER.

All kinds of gatherings take place in the State buildings. While the New York ladies are giving a high tea, just around the corner from them Rain-in-the-Face, who was with Sitting Bull in his last fight, and Curly Head, a Sioux scout, who claims to have been at the Custer massacre, may be holding a reception in the North Dakota parlors. The State Normal School Alumni met in the Iowa Building, and the next day university graduates from Ann Arbor were making people wonder what was going on in Michigan. Every day there is a gathering of commercial travelers in the room given to the T. P. A. in the Missouri Building. Two hundred and fifty members of the choir of the Mormon Tabernacle are coming to sing in the Utah Building.

Montana has several interesting things in natural art. One is a cabinet of silver crystals which came from 1,500 feet under ground, and in which the metal takes the form of shrubbery and has a peculiar luster. Another is a collection of the paintings of the cowboy artist, Russell, who herds cattle all summer and paints all winter in a cabin at Chinook, never having taken a lesson in his life.



HOW THEY GOT THAT BIG EAR OF CORN INTO THE IOWA BUILDING.

Pearls from Wisconsin! They have come—black pearls, dahlia pearls, pink pearls, and white pearls. The story is a familiar one around the Wisconsin Building. The collection brought to the Fair is made up from gems loaned by the owners.

The idea of bringing building material from their respective localities has been scrupulously adhered to by several of the States. West Virginia's house is constructed entirely of the native woods of that State. One of the relics it contains is the sofa on which Grant and Lee sat at Appomattox, and the inkstand in which the pens were dipped to write and sign the terms of surrender. The State buildings are the places to study American history. Minnesota has a Bible 300 years old and a statue of Minnehaha and Hiawatha made by a Norwegian. The school children paid for it with their pennies. The identical gun with which Gen. Israel Putnam shot the wolf is one of the Connecticut treasures. The furniture in the grand reception room of New York's building is between 200 and 300 years old. In the Maryland building are two pictures in oil of what is now the site of Chicago as it appeared in 1829. They were made by Frederic Harrison, who came out to do some surveying in the wilds. Under the dome of California's reproduction of one of the early mission buildings is a palm tree 100 years old, and with a foot of height for each year of its age. It came across the continent from San Diego on two flat cars. Is it any wonder the State buildings have grown into popularity?

The Astor Place Riots.

The trouble arose because of what was believed to have been the ill-treatment received by Edwin Forrest, the tragedian, while in England. When W. C. Macready, the English tragedian, came to this country and his appearpearance at the Astor Place Opera House was announced, an immense faction declared he should never be allowed to play. True to their word, on the night of his first performanc a wild mob filled the theater and surrounded it, fully 20,000 strong. I was then in command of the Seventh Regiment, and at 3 o'clock in the afternoon I received orders to be ready to quell the expected riot at the evening performance. By 6 o'clock the regiment had assembled in the Armory. I personally superintended the distribution of ammunition to the men, and I would like to take occasion now to settle a question in dispute in this respect. There was not a man in the regiment in possession of blank cartridge on that night, and any story to the effect that blank cartridge was used is purely fictitious. We fired to hurt. Toward 9 o'clock we received orders to disperse the mob, and by the time we reached Astor Place it was fully that hour. The regiment was as yet with empty guns, but when I saw what I had to deal with, the instant order was close columns en masse and load at will. Had it not been for this I verily believe the mob would have massacred the whole regiment. Their attack upon us was at once furious and determined, but we responded in like measure. Of the rioters 134 were killed outright and over 100 wounded. Several of our boys received pistol shots and 143 were wounded with stones and other missiles. Thirty-two stand of arms were broken in the hands of our men, but the State replaced them. I have always believed the firing on that night was a salutary lesson to the mob spirit in this city.—Gen. Abram Duryea.

Eye Memory.

Look steadily at a bright object, keep the eyes immovable on it for a short time, and then close them. An image of the object remains; it becomes, in fact, visible to the closed eyes. The vividness and duration of such impression vary considerably with different individuals, and the power of retaining them may be cultivated. An eccentric old man, the once celebrated but now forgotten "Memory Thompson," trained himself to the performance of wonderful feats of eye memory. He could close his eyes and picture within himself a panorama of Oxford street and other parts of London, in which picture every inscription over every shop was so perfect and reliable that he could describe and certify to the names and occupations of the shop-keeping inhabitants of all the houses of these streets at certain dates, when postoffice directories were not as they now are. Although Memory Thompson is forgotten, his special faculty is just now receiving some attention, and it is proposed to specially cultivate it in elementary schools by placing objects before the pupils for a given time, then taking them away and requiring the pupil to draw them. That such a faculty exists and may be of great service is unquestionable.—Gentleman's Magazine.

Come to the Rescue.

As surely as any known effect follows a cause, just so surely will disease of the kidneys succeed their inactivity, if that inaction be not promptly remedied. Come to the rescue with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which gives a healthful impulse to the action of both the kidneys and the bladder, without exciting them like an unmedicated stimulant. Rendered active by this genial diuretic and tonic, they perform their functions thoroughly and regularly, removing from the system impurities which beget rheumatism, dropsy, gravel, Bright's disease, diabetes and catarrh of the bladder. The contraction of either one of these formidable maladies is the penalty exacted by nature for indifference to that plain warning—sluggish action of the kidneys. When this exists, not a moment should be lost in the use of the remedy indicated. Bear in mind that the Bitters will relieve with equal promptitude disorders of the stomach, liver, bowels and nervous system, and cure or prevent malarial complaints.

A Trifle Mixed.

One of the partners in a New York produce house went on a business trip through the South recently, returning to receive a reception from his fellow-brokers which amazed him by its boisterous cordiality. What puzzled him most was the number of inquiries as to his return trip and the joyousness of it. He got an explanation when he saw his last telegram from the South, which he had sent just before starting North. He wrote: "Letters on trip. Coming home. Successful; tank cars." But the operators made it read: "Let her rip. Coming home successfully in tank cars."

Curious.

The water spider which spends most of its time under the water, carries a bubble of air for breathing on the under side of its body, and when this air is exhausted it comes to the surface for more. It is enabled to carry the air-bubble because the under side of its body is covered with tiny hairs set so close together that the surface film of the water does not pass them, although the air does, and thus the air is imprisoned among the hairs.

IT COVERS A GOOD DEAL OF GROUND—Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. And when you hear that it cures so many diseases, perhaps you think "it's too good to be true."

But it's only reasonable. As a blood-cleanser, flesh-builder, and strength-restorer, nothing like the "Discovery" is known to medical science. The diseases that it cures come from a torpid liver, or from impure blood. For everything of this nature, it is the only guaranteed remedy. In Dyspepsia, Biliousness; all Bronchial, Throat and Lung affections; every form of Scrofula, even Consumption (or Lung-scrofula) in its earlier stages, and in the most stubborn Skin and Scalp Diseases—if it ever fails to benefit or cure, you have your money back.

A HINT TO CONGRESS.

THE PEOPLE'S WILL MUST NOT BE DEFEATED.

National Lawmakers Should Turn a Deaf Ear to the Selfish Interests Which Are Conspiring Against the Masses—About Pension Reform.

Give Patriotism a Chance.

There is great activity in the camps of manufacturers and importers since President Cleveland's call for an extra session of Congress on August 7. The trade papers are sounding bugle alarms calling their patrons to arms before their enemy—the consumers—has built fortifications around the committees of Congress which will construct a new tariff bill.

The protected manufacturers want to save as much as possible of McKinleyism. They are busying themselves by holding meetings, drawing up resolutions and petitions and collecting long tables of statistics showing the rates of wages in this and other countries. Notwithstanding the unequivocal declaration of the Chicago platform that protection is an unconstitutional fraud and that duties should be levied for revenue only, the manufacturers still imagine, or fancy that they can make others believe, that the principal duty of the Ways and Means Committee will be in this, as in many previous Congresses, to listen to the resolutions, demands and threats of the beneficiaries of protective tariffs, and that this committee must be as subservient to the wealth of manufacturers, concentrated in trusts and combines, as were Republican committees. The manufacturers forget or ignore the facts that the committees of the present Congress exist in spite of, and not because of, the moneyed interests of any one class; that these committees represent the consumers of the country, and can perform faithful service only by levying duties which shall bear as lightly as possible on the whole people; that statistics of wages and cost of production, showing how necessary protection duties are to certain industries, are of no use to committees engaged in solving the problem of how to raise a sufficient revenue; and that it is the duty of the present Congress not to waste time listening to persons who represent only themselves or some privileged class, and do not speak in the interests of the consumers, who include all classes.

The fact is that, considering the conditions imposed upon the present Congress, it would be an insult to this body for selfish interests to appear before it to ask for special legislation of any kind. They would not expect to get the ear of this Congress if they had not for so long been accustomed to spend several months telling each Congress, upon which they had many claims, just what legislation their interests demanded. The only persons whom Congress should consult are those who are known to be public-spirited citizens and who will speak in the interests of the people at large and not in their own selfish interests. What the country wants, and what Congress should attempt to give it, is a system of taxation which shall rest lightly upon industry and upon the people. Congress should not sit still and wait for comparatively ignorant representatives of the little industries to present long arguments; it should only permit these industries to send in their statements to be considered when necessary, and should invite well-known and able patriots, who have for years been students of social and economic conditions, to present the needs of the people before the committees.

Such a course would be ridiculed as "impractical" by the pearl-button, tin-plate, jack-knife and piano-felt men who figured so prominently in the McKinley bill, but it is time that this country turned its back on these narrow, selfish bigots, and gave ear to the broad-minded men who are recognized as authorities on public questions. We should take advantage of the learning of this age by adopting some of the economic principles which are about as firmly established as is the fact that water always seeks a level. For example, the almost unanimous opinion of authorities for the last fifty years has been that trade is a blessing and not a curse, and that direct is preferable to indirect taxation. Yet, here we are trying to kill trade and using an old fogy method of taxation because it is highly satisfactory to the few manufacturers who have taken the trouble to make our taxation laws for us.

The present Congress should legislate for the whole people to whom it owes its existence. If it shirks its duty and legislates for any class or party, it may expect the fate of the McKinley Congress.—B. W. H.

A Waste of Breath.

Senator Chandler propounds and several Republican newspapers repeat this question:

"Why should not the banks, the Chamber of Commerce and the newspapers recognize and state the exact truth: That the present distressed condition of the business of the country is due to the approaching assault upon the McKinley bill in particular and upon the American protective system in general?"

Because the persons referred to are not mostly fools. None but fools would imagine that a people can be thrown into panic by the prospect of securing their own demand, twice made at the polls, for a reduction of oppressive taxes.

Daniel Webster, the colossal son of New Hampshire, viewing in Jove-like jocundity the local wonder of Genesee Falls, grandiloquently said that "no nation ever lost its liberties that had a waterfall ninety-six feet high." Can the Liliputian Senator of the Granite State point to a nation that ever lost its head over a prospect of tax-reduction?

No!—this is a financial, not a commercial disturbance. The primary trouble is with the currency, not with credits. It is the nation's money that is menaced, not its manufactures. The collapse of swindling trusts has added to the lack of confidence, but these trusts were another outcome of the policy which Mr. Chandler has supported.

The question of tariff reform is closed for four years at least. The beneficiaries and the political agents of the system of a tariff for bounties—of public taxes for private tribute—may as well understand this. The people have ordered a reduction of the worse-than-war tariff, and it is to be reduced. The Democratic Congress and President may be divided on some questions, but they are united on this.

The country looks for this reduction in relief, not in fear. The time has gone by when it can be either bamboozled or frightened by the free-trade bugbear. Mr. Chandler and the Republican organs that echo him are wasting their breath.—New York World.

Silver for Sale.

The silver party of Nevada has called on all silver clubs of that mining camp to pass resolutions denouncing the "conflict on silver." This is better and more seemly than the call of Judge Belford, of Colorado, to assassinate the President. The silver miners ought to calm down. Resolutions of excited mobs are of little account in a business transaction, and they will assuredly not find a market for their product by armed revolution. The manner in which rebellion is met in the United States, as their history shows, is not to surrender to threats. Sensible silver men should suppress the lunatics.—N. Y. World.

All Protection a Fraud.

"Republican protection is a fraud, a robbery of the great majority of the American people for the benefit of the few," says the National Democratic Platform.

This is undoubtedly true, as it has received the official stamp of the people. But we will go the platform makers one better and say that all protection is a fraud, etc.—Democratic, Prohibition, Populist, or Republican protection. The Samuel J. Randall protection to the iron and steel industries of Pennsylvania; the New England protection to its woolen and cotton mills; the New York protection to its barley and potatoes; the South's protection to its sugar and rice; Michigan's protection to its lumber and copper; Ohio's attempted protection to its wool; Colorado's protection to its silver; all protection under whatever name or guise, by whatever party or class, is a fraud and a robbery. Why? Because no one industry can be protected except at the expense of other industries, and if all industries could be equally protected none would receive any protection. But as only a few industries can be protected all "protection is a fraud, a robbery of the great majority of the American people for the benefit of a few."

Such being the case, what are people going to do about it? There is but one sensible and patriotic course—deny to each claimant what cannot possibly be granted to all, and notify the privileged classes—the iron, copper and silver mine owners and the proprietors of woolen mills and protected industries of all kinds, that hereafter each tub must stand on its own bottom. This will hurt the feelings of some of the big tubs that have been utilizing the bottoms of other tubs, but it is the only just solution. Until Senators and Congressmen can broaden their sentiments to include the whole country and the whole people, and are willing, when they meet at Washington, to sink, for the general good, the narrow, selfish interests of their own particular districts or localities, we cannot expect the stoppage of this fraud and robbery.

The main trouble, however, lies with the people themselves, and can be cured only by a more liberal education on economic and social questions. If the great masses of voters understood their needs as well as the few protected manufacturers understood theirs, and if the masses would work and vote, even on the low, selfish grounds of the few who are protected, every politician who serves only the rich of his districts would soon be retired in favor of one who should represent the interests of a majority of voters in the district, and soon protection would be to an end.

Let our next Democratic convention make a note of the fact that all protection is a fraud and a robbery, and that there is no need for the word "Republican" in the next platform.

Pension Reform.

The action of the Pension Bureau in temporarily suspending payment of pensions in certain cases where the official documents do not show such total incapacity for manual labor as is contemplated by the law is right. If the pensioner is lawfully entitled to his pension he will get it. If he has obtained it by false representations he will lose it, and deserves to lose it.

There is an honest soldier and a sound lawyer at the head of the Pension Bureau now, and the business of swindling the people under false pretenses of duty done or suffering incurred in the public service or present incapacity to earn a living is interrupted.

If the Grand Army protests against just and honest administration of the Pension Bureau it will be bad for the Grand Army. It will be split in two, and that wing of it which appears to be organized chiefly for politics and boodle will forfeit the respect and sympathy in which the organization has been held heretofore.—New York World.

TRUSTS are often victims of their own greed. Secure in the legalized spoliation afforded them by the tariff, but unsatisfied with their assured profits, they undertake to further victimize the public by over capitalization and the sale of shares on which it is impossible to earn dividends. The crash among these overdone speculations, following a tight money market, has had very much to do in limiting bank credits and in adding to the doubt and distress of the last sixty days.

A HIGH-TARIFF organ mocks at the farmers who voted last year for "a change" and are now offered lower prices for their wool. But there have been no changes in the tariff. The same high old McKinley duty that was voted to advance the price of wool is still in force, and wool is declining as it has been doing under a high tariff for several years.

Some Mustache History.

What is the history of the mustache? In Greece and Rome no mustaches were worn without beards, but in the conquering days of the Roman Empire several half-civilized races, who had come partially under the influence of the Romans, and who wished to be rid of the name of barbari, or wearers of beards, attempted to shave in imitation of their conquerors; but as they had very imperfect implements for the purpose, and as the upper lip is notoriously the hardest part of the face to shave in the case of any one poorly skilled in the art, they were unable to make a clean job of it, and left a quantity of hair on the upper lip. This mark was characteristic of several nations on the confines of Roman civilization; of the Gauls in particular, of the Dacians and some others. See the Roman statue of the Dying Gaul in the Museum of Fine Arts—perhaps the only classical representation of a mustache to be found in that institution. The Latin language has no word for mustache. This barbarous accident was unworthy of the honor of a Roman name.—Boston Transcript.

An Hereditary Trade.

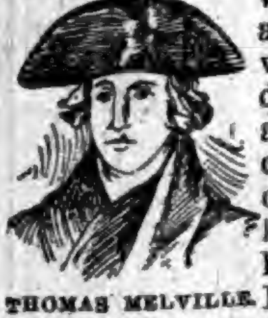
Almost the sole hereditary trade in the United States is that of the deep-water pilot. At most of the important seaports pilotage has been confined for generations to a few families. The Delaware pilots congregate at Lewes, where they have lived these many generations.

HER LITTLE JOKE.—"Why did you toss young Chapley overboard?" "Oh, I was tired of him; I wanted to renew my youth, don't you know."—Life's Calendar.

OUR FIRST TEA PARTY.

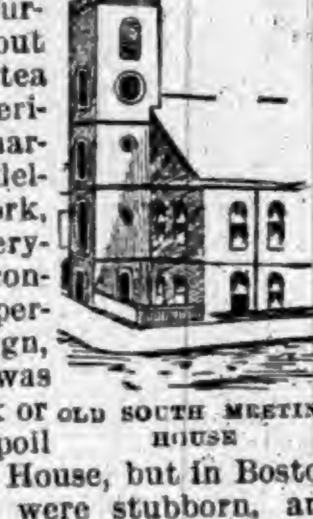
The Participants Dressed as Mohawks and Used Old Ocean as a Teapot.

If anybody were to suggest to the highly cultivated and fashionable citizens of Boston to-day the feasibility of a successful tea party where the guests would don the warpaint of the Mohawks and have their tea steeped in salt water, what a howl of unmitigated horror would greet the daring proposal—and how the wind would be taken out of their sails when they were informed that a tea party identical with this was introduced by Bostonians, and was without exception the most successful one of the kind known in the history of tea parties. Few if any of our readers will fail to recognize our reference to the famous event which was the actual though not the written declaration of American independence. Every schoolboy has read all about this tea party and the occasion of it—how the British Parliament in 1765 passed the stamp act, taxing the colonies without their consent; how it was repealed in 1766, and re-enacted in 1767, when the Townshend revenue acts imposed obnoxious duties on glass, paper, lead and paints, on wine, oil and fruits and above all on tea; how this was followed by defiance, punishment, murder and massacre and, when the King repealed everything else, the tax on tea still remained to be the issue between colonial freedom and colonial slavery.



THOMAS MELVILLE.

King George still insisted on his right to tax the colonies without their consent and while they had no vote nor representation in Parliament, "and," said Lord North, Prime Minister of Great Britain, "the King means to try the question with America." With this end in view, the East India Company was encouraged to send out large cargoes of tea to several American ports, Charleston, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston. Everywhere else the consignees were persuaded to resign, and the tea was either sent back or remained to spoil in the Custom House, but in Boston the consignees were stubborn, and hence the tea party of which we speak. When the Dartmouth arrived at Boston, Nov. 28, 1773, with a cargo of tea on board, 5,000 resolute men swarmed about Faneuil Hall, and, organizing themselves into a meeting, unanimously adopted the resolution offered by Samuel Adams, to the effect that "the tea shall not be allowed to land," that "it shall be sent back in the same bottom to the place whence it came," and that "no duty shall be paid on it." The meeting then adjourned to the old South Meeting House, and the owner and captain of the Dartmouth were warned that the ship would be entered or the tea landed at their peril. The ship was put under an armed guard, and when, on Dec. 16, two other ships arrived they had to join company with it. According to law, tea had to be landed within twenty days. The owner wished to return, but the collector refused to give him a clearance paper to London till he should land his tea.



OLD SOUTH MEETING HOUSE

The people then held their famous meeting in Old South Meeting House on Dec. 16 and while sitting Rotch, the owner of the Dartmouth, appealed to the Governor of Massachusetts for a pass, but had to inform the assemblage that he was peremptorily refused. Then when the last expedient of lawful resistance had failed, John Rowe was heard to exclaim "who knows how tea will mingle with salt water." This was enough. Further delay was impossible, and shortly afterwards disguised as Mohawk Indians, the Boston tea party issued from the door of the Old South Meeting House and started for the ships. There was no riot, no disorder, no damage done, except to the tea. They simply boarded the three ships in full view of a British fleet, anchored close at hand and, breaking the chests, spilt the tea into the ocean. They were aided by a party of volunteers who turned out in boats and stirred it up in the "pot" effectually. The only tea brought ashore came in the shoes of one of the "Mohawks," Thomas Melville, and a sample gathered by Dr. Thaddeus M. Harris is preserved by the Antiquarian Society at Dorchester, Mass. So far as is known only one man was arrested, a Mr. Eckley, and he was never brought to trial. But more serious developments followed and this was in reality the beginning of the revolutionary war.

The site rendered memorable by this famous exploit is now occupied by a coal office.

The Reason of the Dog.

The young woman with the fluffy curls was giving a lot of attention to the small dog she carried, and the young man looking on said: "That's just like a woman, to be making such a fuss over an insignificant little beast. A woman just naturally has to have something to love."

"Love, nothing," growled the elder man. "She just has to have something to talk to."—Indianapolis Journal.

The Chinese Have Few Words.

There are said to be but 450 words in the Chinese language, all monosyllabic. These, with different accents and intonations, are expanded into 1,250 words. Each word has many different meanings, some as many as 40.

Discretion Wins Many a Fight.

"I have met the best tennis players in the land, but I have never been beaten."

"How wonderful! Why don't you enter the tournament?"

"I never play."

You can Economize

By using Royal Baking Powder to the exclusion of all other leavening agents. The official analysts report it to be 27% greater in leavening strength than the other powders. It has three times the leavening strength of many of the cheap alum powders.

It never fails to make good bread, biscuit and cake, so that there is no flour, eggs or butter spoiled and wasted in heavy, sour and uneatable food.

Do dealers attempt, because times are dull, to work off old stock, or low grade brands of baking powder? Decline to buy them. During these times all desire to be economical, and Royal is the most Economical Baking Powder.

Making the Best of It.

A German girl who recently came to America to marry a man who had been here for some years, and who had made himself so indispensable to his employers that he could not even be spared long enough to go to Germany to fetch his bride, tells some amusing experiences in her new home.

"The thing which vexed me most," she said, after relating all sorts of queer mistakes which she naturally made, "was about my sheets. I had a beautiful set, all linen, and all embroidered and worked with initials by my own hands. When I got here the American beds were all so big that not one of my sheets could be used."

"What a shame!" exclaimed her sympathetic listener. "What did you do?"

"Well, you see," the bride answered with a smile, "of course they were as much too large for handkerchiefs as they were too small for sheets; and so I took them for towels. And everybody thinks they are lovely."

Sheep as Beasts of Burden.

In the northern part of India sheep are put to a use unthought of in European countries. They are made to serve as beasts of burden. The mountain paths among the foothills of the Himalayas are so precipitous that the sheep, more sure-footed than larger beasts, are preferred as burden carriers. The load for each sheep is from sixteen to twenty pounds. The sheep are driven from village to village, with the wool still growing, and in each town the farmer shears as much wool as he can sell there, and loads the sheep with the grain which he receives in exchange. After his flock has been sheared he returns it homeward, each sheep having on its back a small bag containing the purchased grain.

Reviving the Wayside Inn.

The bicycle has produced some queer changes. It is restoring the wayside inn, among other things. Along certain country roads not far from Boston, which are much frequented by wheelmen, and especially along those in the direction of the beaches, there are little summer restaurants or cafes which derive the largest part of their income from passing riders of bicycles. Ice cream, chowder, coffee, cakes, and that sort of thing find a ready sale to parties of heated wheelmen, who sit upon open platforms and gossip with the waiter girls, who are generally of a nice sort of country persons; and presently they fare along the road again, quite like cavaliers of old.—Boston Transcript.

Lubeck.

The city of Lubeck, Germany, which will shortly celebrate its seven hundred and fifty third anniversary, has rather an interesting history. The city was founded in 1140, was ceded to the Dukes of Saxony eighteen years later, and in 1201 was taken by the Danes. It was made a free imperial city in 1226, when the Danish garrison was expelled, and in 1241 it became the head of the Hanseatic league. Blucher took refuge in Lubeck to avoid the French army, when it was carried by assault and suffered a three days' pillage, in November, 1806. Nov. 12, 1810, the city was annexed to the French Empire, and regained its freedom in 1813, after the battle of Leipsic.

Frank.

Some ladies never, never can understand that a man of letters should sometimes be left alone in his den. Byron himself says that, however much in love he might be at any moment, he always felt, even when with the fair, a hankering to be back in his untidy library. There is a story of Lady Byron's entering the den and asking: "Do I disturb you, Byron?" "Yes; damnably," answered Childe Harold, in an intelligible, if not a pardonable irritation.

Caught in His Own Trap.

A Quaker shopkeeper one day met a Quaker customer of his going round with her bundles.

He had been absent from his place of business, and suspected that she had been trading with a rival whom he did not much love.

"How much a yard did you give for this, Mary?"

"One shilling and sixpence."

"Why, I am surprised at thee. I could let thee have it for one and two. And how much for this?"

"Three shillings."

"That was very unreasonable. I could let thee have it for two shillings. Why will thee go trading with strangers and world's people, Mary?"

"What is thee talking about, friend John? I did buy all these things at thy shop, and if thee says the truth thee must owe me quite a considerable amount of money."

WATERLOO.

Miss Flora Speer was married yesterday.

Mrs. Edge has received a telegram from her son, calling her to Chicago.

Editor Willis went to Chicago Monday afternoon to be absent till Wednesday.

Miss Yeagy recently visited in Fort Wayne, but returned in time to attend the normal.

The normal school is enjoyed very much by those attending Five new names were added to the enrollment this week.

George Morell and wife, of Auburn, and Mrs. Will Fisher and son Wallie, of this place, went to Chicago the first of the week to attend the fair.

Jacob Showalter was walking around town last week, calling in at the business places on Wayne street. He is eighty years of age and looks quite feeble, but claims to be well and smart and talked of walking over to Auburn, which has been his home for several years past.

Fred Roby, wife and daughter and Mrs. Stevens and niece, Grace Roby, have been spending several weeks at Lake Gage. They report a good time and the fishing good, Mrs. Stevens capturing the largest fish. Mr. Roby and family have returned to their home in Chicago, after two months spent in visiting his niece, Mrs. Stevens.

The black diphtheria is in Angola. Mr. Camp, of the firm of Wickwire & Camp, marble cutters and dealers in monuments, tombstones, etc., went to some town in Michigan on a visit and brought the disease back with him. His little girl has since died with it. The mother is down with it now and the father with the remaining children have been sent back to the town where they took the disease. Nuns from Ft. Wayne have been engaged to attend the sick mother, and precautions have been taken to prevent the spread of the disease.

Tuesday night or Wednesday morning burglars broke into Curt Klotz's blacksmith shop where they obtained tools and broke into the stores of Sinclair Bros., Craig Day, John Maxson and Mrs. Winslow. It is supposed money was the object, as they only took two or three revolvers and several penknives from Sinclair's hardware, thirty-nine cents from Day's hardware, forty old silver watches from Maxson's jewelry store. Nothing has thus far been missed from Mrs. Winslow's drug store. All the doors were pried open with a cold chisel except at Maxson's where a crowbar evidently was used.

Tuesday evening, Marsh, the Hillsdale fakir, fixed his wagon with his goods and the same darkey he had here last year, in front of Jules Denison's confectionery store. By the aid of their supposed wit, they proceeded to draw the crowd. That accomplished, the light was made brighter and sales commenced. To see how rapidly his goods were exchanged for good money, no one would imagine the times are hard, or that there is any scarcity of the "needful." Those who have for several weeks past spent a large portion of their time sitting in front of their places of business watching for a stray customer, probably did some thinking in regard to it.

WATERLOO.

LAST WEEK.

C. P. Houser of Jackson township, made a brief business trip to Waterloo Tuesday.

W. H. Leas and family have been spending several days at Lake James the guests of Nora Leas and Etta Miller.

Joseph Zwilling who has a situation as clerk with a merchant at State Center, Iowa, is home visiting his mother and sister.

One of H. E. Trout's horses is said to have become tired of standing on the street and getting tangled in the harness fell down Tuesday.

E. Y. Williamson, who has been down about Decatur building a fine residence for a relative, came home for a visit with his people here and in Auburn.

Attorney F. K. Blake of Wichita, contemplates changing his place of business on his return from visiting friends in Waterloo and vicinity. He expects to locate in St. Louis.

A domestic disagreement in the west part of town on Monday caused a family dissolution. Trying to separate twice in one week is not a success. Three times will be a success no doubt.

Contending parties in Smithfield tp., indulged in a lawsuit in 'Squire Walker's court recently over a few bushels of oats. Grain must be scarce in that vicinity, the costs being higher than the value however.

A man north of this place is reported to have objected to silver certificates in a recent deal of real estate and caused the purchaser to make a trip to this place for change of currency. He should carry gold and silver hereafter.

The board of trustees or rather the street commissioners are having much trouble in managing the streets. They assume to have the right to appropriate them for private purposes in various ways One of the latest plans on their part was to lease a part of one for a candy kitchen near the engine house to which a livery men interposed an objection. Better try again gentlemen.

BUTLER.

The continued dry weather is making short gardens in this vicinity.

Harvesting is nearly done and the crop all around is a very good one.

Avery Ackerman will become Wolff's leading clerk in the near future.

Quite a few of the families that moved from Butler to Ashley and other points are moving back.

Mrs. Stone's new ironclad building near the corner of Broadway and North street is nearing completion.

Our M. E. friends held their quarterly meeting service Sunday, Rev. Woolpert preaching morning and evening.

Benjamin Funk, a well known farmer living four miles northwest of Butler, is reported verg seriously ill with meager hopes of recovery.

Considerable is being done in the way of graveling the roads leading into town and it is hoped when bad roads come again that we can get in and out of town with more convenience.

Carpenters and other mechanics have been busy for the past ten days improving and decorating the Haverstock block. When completed it will compare favorably with the best stores in town.

Many Butler people visited Edgerton last Sunday to see the ruins of its great fire which swept out almost an entire block of its business houses last Friday night. The fire started in a photograph gallery on the east side of the street in the old Farnum store building, erected when Edgerton was a mere gravel pit in the fifties, and burning both north and south, consumed one of the hardest old frame ranges in Northern Ohio, there being eleven buildings in the row. It then lapped around the new Farnum brick building and eat up another hard old row of eight frame structures. At this juncture a fire engine arrived from Bryan and checked the further progress of the flames, but not until some twenty eight structures had been wiped out. The loss, as reported to the Toledo Blade, is placed at $35,000. This is grossly exaggerated. The loss is perhaps less than half that sum. The insurance, largely in little Ohio companies, placed by outside agents, is reported to be about $15,000. This will, in all probability, be cut in two near the middle, as the stocks were mostly saved. This is the first fire of any magnitude this old town has ever had and, will most likely result in a marked advantage. Good buildings will take the place of the old fire traps that stood in the way of progress and possibly in some fire appliance to aid in time of disaster.

Dangerous Journalism.

When the Ft. Wayne Daily Journal reached Auburn last Thursday morning our people were astonished to read in great headlines that F J. Yesbera Auburn's leading jeweler, and one of the most popular business men had failed for a large sum of money. If news was what our people take the Journal for, here they had it, for no one here had heard of such a thing. The fact that the dispatch was sent from Waterloo, was also a matter of surprise, for the Journal has a correspondent in Auburn. But Mr. Yesbera was going on about his business as usual, but was very properly indignant when he heard the rumor and saw the dispatch. The facts are that instead of being "forced to the wall," Mr. Yesbera is in the best of circumstances. Believing a wrong had been done Mr. Yesbera, we interviewed a leading member of our banks, and the first sentence he said was to the effect that the gentleman was in excellent shape, and "did not owe $25." From all other sources and without meeting Mr. Yesbera, our belief in his business stability was confirmed. Now as to the part the Journal and its correspondent at Waterloo played in this unfortunate matter. Surely a paper like the Journal, or any paper for the matter of that, should see to it, that sensational dispatches are true before it gives them out to the world. Especially, should it be careful in a matter of this kind when such an item might bring an ordinary business man to ruin. At this particular time, too, when there is a feeling of uncertainty in business circles, it becomes doubly, the duty of a newspaper manager to be careful. Suppose Mr. Yesbera, as is often the case with a man in business, happened to owe considerable money. Such a dispatch would have ruined him, as his creditors would have come on in a pile and though he might be worth many times the amount of his debts, it would all be sacrificed to satisfy creditors that would very gladly have given him ample time to turn himself, but for this report sent out to the world. His debts might not be at all burdensome, yet they could sweep everything by the board But what makes the Journal's course still more surprising is the fact that with a correspondent in Auburn, it did not ask by telephone or otherwise, as to the correctness of the dispatch from Waterloo. The very fact that its Auburn correspondent had not mentioned this matter and that it came from a town five miles beyond, should have put the Journal on its guard. This irresponsible style of sensational journalism is fast becoming a nuisance. Too often the sanctity of homes and the privacy of counting rooms are invaded and torn from the protection that should be theirs, and cast out into the glare of public scrutiny. And not for any possible good purpose, but to cater to a growing taste for the sensational. That there exists such a taste on the part of the public is lamentable; that any respectable paper should so far forget its duty to society and to business interests, as to give up its columns to such reprehensible journalism is still more lamentable. It is worse; it is dangerous. The Journal has been giving its columns a pretty wide range in this regard lately, some of its correspondents going to such wild lengths as to make the Journal ridiculous. The least thing the Journal can do is to offer Mr. Yesbera an ample apology. But one thing remains for it to do for the public, and that is to turn over a new leaf and re-enter the paths of legitimate journalism and keep there.

LATER: Saturday morning, the Journal had a brief retraction, a very tame one in fact. It don't seem to realize the condition in which it is placed, nor express any regret. It says the dispatch was "clipped" from the Indianapolis News. But it appeared in the Journal as having been an original item sent from Waterloo to Ft. Wayne. While this does not free the Journal from blame, it also puts the News into a bad box. And now we ask the Indianapolis News, why it did not ascertain the truth of such a dangerous report before sending it out over the state? And we might add that the correspondent at Waterloo must be a daisy. In fact we have seen enough of the items from that place before to settle that question.

HEADACHE, SLEEPLESSNESS, NERVOUS PROSTRATION.

Dr. Miles Medical Co., Elkhart, Ind.

Gentlemen: I take pleasure in informing you of the very beneficial results which have followed the use of DR. MILES' RESTORATIVE NERVINE in the case of myself and wife. For a year I was subject to a distressing pain at the base of the brain and upper portion of the spinal cord. I lost flesh and was greatly troubled with sleeplessness. Your Nervine was highly recommended to me. My case had been so obstinate that I had no confidence in the efficacy of any medicine. Yet as a last resort I consented to give it a trial. Much to my surprise, I experienced marked benefit; my sleeplessness disappeared; my headache was removed; my spirits and general health greatly improved. I soon gained twenty pounds. All this occurred after learned and well known physicians had failed. My wife is taking the Nervine with the best of results. LOUIS D. VANDERVERE.

AUBURN AND VICINITY.

Some Reminiscences of its Early Days and Pioneer Citizens.

1872.

The star of Auburn was now in the ascendant and strangers, especially from the border towns of Ohio, flocked to this new El Dorado of speculative and business promise.

That attention had been directed to this point in such a way as stimulated this movement and gave a correct forecast of the town's future was evidenced by statements like the following abridgment of a communication to the Ada Record, published in the fall of 1827:

"Auburn is the county seat of DeKalb county, Indiana. For years, it appeared to be in a state of decline in consequence of the failure of the Eel River Railroad being completed some twenty years ago while the neighboring town of Waterloo was enjoying unrivaled the advantages of the Southern Michigan railroad. But a change has taken place for the better that will make this one of the most thriving and pleasant places in that state.

The location through Auburn of the Fort Wayne, Jackson & Saginaw railroad, a line that has been in operation two years, the completion of the Eel River road to within a short distance, and the almost certainty of the Baltimore & Ohio extension to Chicago touching the town to the south, have combined to give the town an impetus wholly unexpected by those who for a few years had not seen Auburn.

Three dry goods stores, a half dozen factories and some twenty business places constitute the nucleus of the coming trade and manufacture of which the place is capable.

There are ten or more lawyers and physicians resident and the latter professionals are well up with the progress of medical science, Many nice mercantile houses and family residences have already been built in the old portion of the town and these relieve the contrast that would otherwise be presented with the new, recently built portion. The country surrounding has a rich soil and level surface, and the fine farm buildings are substantial evidence of agricultural resources."

This outside opinion was good and true so far as it went, but it fell far short of expressing the stirring activity of the leading townsmen in furtherance of Auburn interests and the openings that invited enterprise.

The population did not rest content with the completion of the Eel River railroad to Auburn Junction, but held meetings early in November at Butler as well as at Auburn in the interest of its rightful extension eastward. At a meeting at the county seat, presided over by J. E. Rose, who, long a citizen of the former town, had now permanently located here, an address was delivered by President Collins, who gave assurance that the road would be built without delay to the Ohio line provided a subscription of $4,000 per mile could be raised. A committee of five to secure the required amount were appointed, composed of the following named Auburn citizens: George Ensley, Enos Weaver, Frank D. Ryan, William McIntyre and A. L. Hollopeter.

These men worked hard, but subscriptions came in slowly. It is easier for the public to look backward than forward. Take up the rails of the three roads that give Auburn its communication with the country at large and, aside from loss of railroad revenues, a half of the acre valuage and two thirds of the value of every town lot would disappear to return only with their replacement. In this light, the importance of the services of those men who had the foresight to perceive and who labored so strenuously to secure, our present railroad facilities, becomes apparent and claims recognition from old time resident and subsequent arrivals.

Various rumors of other routes inferentially adverse to our town were circulated from time to time, leaving the matter in doubt until the last of February, 1875, when William Clapp brought the welcome news from Baltimore that the B. & O. Company had decided to build upon the Defiance, or present line. It was promised that the road would be constructed via Auburn, provided a sixty-six foot right of way would be tendered at an early day, but no subscriptions were asked.

A meeting at the courthouse was a scene of much enthusiasm, betokening an interest beyond ordinary. Two committees; numbering three persons in each, were promptly appointed and started out, the one going east, the other west, to work up and secure the required right of way.

The first party had completed their mission by March 7, and returned with the gratifying news that the farmers of Jackson, Concord and Newville townships, through whose lands the survey ran, had with few exceptions, cheerfully donated the right of way.

The second party were not so fortunate, but the prospect was encouraging and soon after, the county was reported ready to respond to the demand for a roadway.

About the last of October, a Mr. Hampshire, the right of way agent for the company, addressed an assemblage of citizens at the court house and a party of five was chosen to go over the proposed route in this county and act with him in closing the business with the farmers.

No little disappointment was felt by many of our people that the line did not run nearer town, but it was held that by crossing at the Junction, the grounds intervening between town and that point, would ultimately be built up and that this outlying suburb could never bring about a change in the existing business center.

All were urged to do what they could for the railroad and thereby increase the probability that the company would make Auburn the location of division shops. Effort was sensibly increased and encouraged by a statement on the part of this company that: "We intend neither to swindle nor to be swindled. Wherever the general advantages of route will not be sacrificed, it is just and politic to avoid contact with communities controlled by a spirit of narrow selfishness and avarice and to seek to establish relations with those where a different feeling promises co-operation, good will and fair dealing."

This old and powerful company meant just what they said and, acting on this common sense principle, a tamarack swamp was destined to become a flourishing town site, and even the improvements which were actually placed upon their right of way just south of town, were in time removed and a bright opportunity forever lost; a heavy and not unusual penalty for excessive price demanded for farm lands occupying the site of the intended division terminus buildings.

DOINGS OF THE DAY.

SUMMARY OF THE NEWS OF THE WEEK.

Many Depredations by Tramps and Burglars in Kansas—Indians Dancing for War in Wisconsin—Child Badly Scalded—Lit the Fire with Kerosene.

DANCING FOR WAR.

Indians in Paint, 300 Strong, Are Menacing the Lives of Whites in Wisconsin.

Special advices from Lake Shell and Spooner, in Washburn County, Wisconsin, on the Chicago, Milwaukee and Omaha Railroad, say that between 400 and 500 Indians have congregated and may don the war paint. These red men have come from the reservations in the northern part of Minnesota and Wisconsin. They secured special permits from the Government to go off on a tour to pick blueberries, which are found in very large quantities in Washburn County, and they have taken advantage of this freedom to a dangerous degree. In the vicinity of their present location there are several settlements of Indians and they have gathered their red brethern about them till now a small sized army could easily be mustered out of their numbers. Three squaw houses and several dancing platforms have been built seven miles from the lake and the nightly revels of these Indians make the woods resound. Whisky is plentiful and flows freely. Many Indians are armed and they have gone so far as to raise their rifles to shoot and in many instances the escape of settlers from death has been narrow. Trouble is expected.

TRAMPS AND BURGLARS.

Take Advantage of the Movements of Miners.

Topeka (Kas.) special: The stream of idle workmen from Colorado continue to pour through Kansas. Reports received here by the police department state that many depredations have been committed in the towns along the line of the Santa Fe and Union Pacific railways. Houses have been broken into and valuables stolen, both in the towns and country. Reports to the police authorities state that tramps and burglars all along these lines of roads have taken advantage of this movement east of idle workmen and are plundering residences in towns and farm houses in the country. At Stanford a tramp ordered the Santa Fe agent to hold up his hands, and before the agent could turn around the tramp shot him in the neck, inflicting a dangerous wound and then escaped.

Railroads Must Observe Quarantine Regulations.

The United States district court at Marquette, Mich., has denied the injunction asked for by the Minneapolis, St. Paul and Sault Ste Marie Railway Company to restrain the Michigan State Board of Health from enforcing its quarantine regulations at Sault Ste Marie. There was a nice question involved as to the respective rights of federal and state governments in the premises and the result is a complete victory for the State Board.

Paddy Won.

The light weight finish fight between Paddy Smith, brother to Denver Ed Smith, and "Young Corbett," otherwise known as George Green, at the Columbian Athletic Club, Roby, Ind., attracted 5,000 people. The purse was for $3,500, of which $500 went to the loser. This was "Young Corbett's" first finish fight. Champion Jim Corbett was there to see it. Smith won in the twenty-eighth round.

Child Badly Scalded.

A 3-year-old son of Mr. A. C. Freed of McComb, Ohio, was seriously scalded by falling into a pail of hot water. Mrs. Freed, in preparing to wash, had set the pail upon the floor and her attention for a moment being in another direction, the little one stumbled and fell backward into the pail. Although it is a bad scald, it is thought it will recover.

Lit the Fire with Kerosene.

The house of J. H. Langevine, a farmer, near Olga, N. D., was burned recently, through lighting a fire with kerosene. Two of his children were burned to death, and Langevine and his wife were so badly injured that their recovery is doubtful.

White Cappers Sentenced.

Birmingham (Ala.) special: Nineteen white cappers were sentenced to Stillwater, Minn., for deeds committed in Cherokee and Clebourne counties. Some got four and others six years, with additional fines of $500 each.

Resumption of Business Activity.

Noblesville (Ind.) special: The American Carbon works in this city have started up full blast after a period of partial inactivity. All the factories here are running now, and the worst of the hard times is about over.

Chicago's New Chief.

Mayor Harrison has issued an order appointing Michael Brennan Acting Superintendent of Police of Chicago, to take the place of Major R. W. McClaughry.

Fourth Auditor Appointed.

The President has appointed Charles B. Morton of Maine, fourth Auditor of the Treasury, vice John R. Lynch of Mississippi, resigned.

French Open Fire.

A report from Paris gives the details of the beginning of hostilities at Bangkok, Siam. A Siamese gunboat was rammed and sunk, the islands at the mouth of the Mekong and Fort Donson captured, and the governor of the island of Khong killed. The blockade will be enforced as soon as the powers can be notified.

Closed by a Run.

The Traders' Bank of Mount Sterling, Ky., is closed by order of the directors, who met and decided to suspend payment. A heavy run caused the failure. Liabilities are $150,000, with good assets of $300,000. An early resumption is probable.

RIOT IN PARLIAMENT.

Debate of Home Rule Results in an Almost Unprecedented Scene.

The home rule question caused a hand-to-hand conflict in the House of Commons at London Thursday night beside which Donnybrook fair pales into insignificance. All thoughts of dignity were forgotten and the members fought right and left like so many cats and dogs. The trouble was started by Joseph Chamberlain, leader of the opposition to Gladstone; he, in attempting to reply to the Grand Old Man, used the bitterest invective, and was interrupted by T. P. O'Connor, who hissed "Judas." In an instant the whole space between the front benches was filled with a struggling, cursing mass of members, striking, clawing and upsetting each other. Manful efforts were made to separate the combatants. Both sergeants-at-arms forced their way through the thick of the fight, but as fast as one group was pacified another came to blows. Eventually Mr. Gladstone begged Edward Majoribanks, a sturdy liberal, to do something to stop the fighting. Mr. Majoribanks dug his way through the tangled mass of belligerents, and by repeated appeals in the name of the Premier, succeeded in stemming the conflict. Mr. Gladstone, sitting bolt upright, watched the scene with inflamed face and an expression of sorrow, indignation and astonishment, which will never be erased from the memory of those observing it.

LAW'S AWFUL HORROR.

Electrocution of Taylor at Auburn Terribly Mismanaged.

The attempt to electrocute Murderer William G. Taylor in the State Prison at Auburn N. Y., resulted in a horrible accident. The foot rest of the chair broke and the dynamo gave out, so that a second current could not be applied. He was not dead from the first contact and soon began breathing heavily. He was placed on a cot and conveyed back to his corridor, where he continued breathing and groaning, with pulse growing stronger. Power had to be obtained from the city's electric plant, and Taylor was replaced in the chair and electrocuted to death. Morphine had to be administered in the meantime. Witnesses are not permitted to leave the prison. Taylor and his victim, Solomon Johnson, were second-term men and were shopmates in the broom industry at Auburn prison. Taylor was 27 years old and was serving a ten years' sentence for burglary. On April 27, 1890, he made an unsuccessful attempt to escape and the following day he assaulted a keeper, for which offense he forfeited all commutation. October, 1890, he was transferred to the asylum for insane criminals, where he remained until Sept. 14, 1891, when he was discharged as cured and began life in Auburn Prison. The murder was committed on the afternoon of Sept. 20, 1892.

PENSION MONEY DIVISION.

Bureau Prepares an Estimate of the Ensuing Year's Expenses.

The Pension Bureau has prepared an estimate of the division of the appropriation provided by Congress at the last session for the support of the pension service during the fiscal year just begun and ending June 30, 1894. The amount of the appropriation was $166,180,565. Whether this will cover the expenses of the service remains to be seen. It is thought likely, however, that a deficiency appropriation may be required. The appropriation of $166,180,565 has been divided into the following payments:

Army pensions	$161,000,000
Navy pensions	3,649,215
Fees of examining surgeons	1,000,000
Salaries of agents	72,000
Clerk hire, pension agencies	400,000
Rents, pension agencies	22,850
Fuel and light, pension agencies	1,500
Contingent expenses, pension agencies	35,000

Of course this appropriation does not include the cost of maintaining the Pension Bureau in Washington and paying the expense of running the bureau. That is provided by the legislative appropriation bill.

MAIL TRAIN WRECKED.

One Man Killed and Several Hurt in an Accident on the Old Colony.

The New York mail train on the Old Colony, which left Boston at midnight Monday, ran into a freight car standing on the track at Dodgeville. The train was making forty miles an hour when it struck the obstruction. The engine was badly demolished and the forward mail cars completely wrecked. A mail clerk named C. J. Miller, belonging in New York, was instantly killed, and another clerk named Murphy was seriously hurt. Several of the passengers were also injured.

BANKS STILL FAILING.

Milwaukee, Indianapolis, and Louisville Now the Sufferers.

The Wisconsin Fire and Marine Insurance Bank, the Indianapolis National Bank and the Bank of Commerce, and the Merchants' National and Louisville Deposit Banks, at Louisville, suspended Tuesday morning. This makes four Louisville banks that have collapsed in three days. In each case the depositors will be paid in full, although the stockholders may lose considerably.

Robbed His Countrymen.

Thirty thousand dollars is the sum which H. Bertrand Nemitz, representative of thirty-five Swiss watchmakers, exhibiting in Manufactures Hall, is accused of having stolen. Nemitz, together with his 18-year-old son, Bertrand, has left Chicago, and news of their arrest is hourly expected from Toronto, Canada. For many years Nemitz has been a prominent figure in Switzerland's politics and industrial life. He has attended all the leading expositions during the last twenty years, always in a position of trust. Valuable contracts for government and municipal work have been awarded him during the time he was not engaged away from the country. It was an easy matter for him to induce watchmakers of his native land to intrust him with their valuable exhibits, which in value aggregate $2,500,000. Indeed, the manufacturers gladly made him their representative. It was believed that in his hands their joint interests would be carefully looked after.

Ohio Prohibition Ticket.

Ohio Prohibitionists have nominated the following State ticket: Governor, Rev. Gideon P. Machlin, of Germantown; Lieutenant Governor, S. H. Ellis, of Warren County; Treasurer, Abraham Ludlow, of Springfield; Attorney General, S. E. Young, of Portage; Supreme Court Judge, J. A. Gallaher, of Bellaire; Food and Dairy Commissioner, S. H. Todd, of Wakeman; member of the Board of Public Works, E. H. Brosius, of Clark County.

Will Be Hanged.

Parker and McAfee, the negroes condemned for the murder of Druggist Eyster, were taken from Indianapolis, Ind., to Michigan City prison, where they will be executed Nov. 3.

The Baby Is Dead.

The infant son of Edward Bevan at Bucyrus, Ohio, drank the contents of a bottle of carbolic acid and died in a few hours.

Wheat Very Cheap.

There was a sharp break in wheat Friday at Chicago, due to the continued distrust in financial circles. The price was lower than it has ever been before in the Chicago market since the war. For July delivery it sold as low as 59¾ cents, against 61¾ cents, the previous low price. The action of the Chicago banks in authorizing the issuance of clearing-house certificates in case there is any demand for them did not help matters, although it was said to be a measure of safety. The banks were said to have determined to call loans on wheat.

GIGANTIC BUBBLE PRICKED.

The Erie Road Has Squandered $16,000,000 in Twenty-one Months.

The headlines over an Associated Press dispatch read as follows: Erie is a wreck. Surplus of $10,000,000 disappears in twenty-one months, and a floating indebtedness of $6,000,000 has been created. Most gigantic bubble ever known is about to be pricked. Stock and bond holders on both sides of the Atlantic will soon be on the anxious seat. Already the English have appointed a committee to look into the problem. Railroad men are amazed at the disappearance of the $16,000,000 in so short a time. Stock issue of $85,000,000 and funded debt in excess of $77,000,000. The road has a capitalization of more than $804,000 a mile. It has 551 miles of leased and owned lines and controls as much more which has never paid the rental. One, the "Nypano," has securities charged against it of $370,000 a mile. Mortgages piled fourteen layers deep on the system. Preferred stock quoted at 5.

GOLD IN THE TREASURY.

Lacks but Little of Reaching the $100,000,000 Reserve Mark.

From present indications the gold in the Treasury will soon pass $100,000,000. When the $100,000,000 mark is passed the Treasury will again resume the issuance of gold certificates, which by law had to be suspended when the Treasury gold was reduced below $100,000,000. The gold certificates now outstanding aggregate $89,000,000, which is an unusually small quantity for the Treasury to have. The department, however, shows little or no interest whether the gold is $100,000,000 or $75,000,000, as it is the policy of Secretary Carlisle to use the gold on hand the same as he does currency in meeting the obligations of the Treasury. For several months past the gold reserve has been treated as available cash. On this basis the available cash in the Treasury Saturday was $122,000,000.

Boies to Retire to Private Life.

A Keokuk, Iowa, dispatch says: Governor Boies was in the city, returning home from a visit to the Fort Madison Penitentiary. In the course of an interview regarding the report that he was a candidate for renomination, and in case of success at the polls this fall that he would make the race for United States Senator, he said: "I am through with politics. Under no circumstances will I accept another nomination for Governor, and so far as my being a candidate for Senator is concerned, such is far from the case, as I would not accept it as a gift. When my present term expires I shall retire to private life."

China Defines Her Own Rights.

The London correspondent of the Berlin Koelnische Zeitung telegraphs: "China has reserved rights of sovereignty over the principality of Ching-Hong, extending southward to the twenty-first parallel and consisting of four districts to the right of the Mekong and eight to the left. Without Great Britain's knowledge China sent troops to this region months ago. These troops would, if necessary, co-operate with the black flags. China induced Great Britain to cede to her the claims accruing to her in this region from the conquest of Burmah."

Suspended Pensions.

The total number of pensioners under the act of June 27, 1890, whose pensions have been suspended since the incoming of the present administration is 5,250. The whole number of pensions granted under this act is 370,000. Of this number 70,000 were to widows, minors and dependent relatives, leaving 300,000 to be investigated. So far about 25 per cent. have been suspended, and if the same ratio is maintained through the entire list, about 75,000 will have been suspended.

Flood at Pueblo.

At Pueblo, Colo., the Arkansas river began to rise and the entire lower portion of the city is threatened with inundation. There is six feet of water on the sides of the City Hall and all the basements in that block are filling. Hundreds of people living in the flats have fled to higher grounds. The water works are closed by the flood. The loss will approximate $1,000,000.

Alabama Editors at the Fair.

Alabama editors joined the procession of molders of public opinion at the Fair Tuesday. They had a reception at the Arkansas State Building, with addresses and music, and afterward set out to do the grounds. There were a great number of them and many of them are accompanied by their wives.

Was Tired of Living.

W. H. Irving, of Winthrop Beach, Mass., about 40 years old and well dressed, committed suicide at Chicago the other night. A partly filled can of powder by his side and the horribly torn and mangled face indicated that Irving had filled his mouth with powder and then exploded it.

Brewing Company Fails.

The Obermann Brewing Company of Milwaukee has failed, as a result of the suspension of the Mitchell bank. The liabilities are $295,000.

Cyclone in Minnesota.

It is reported at Duluth that a cyclone struck the west end of the Mesaba River, doing great damage.

SIAM HAS WEAKENED

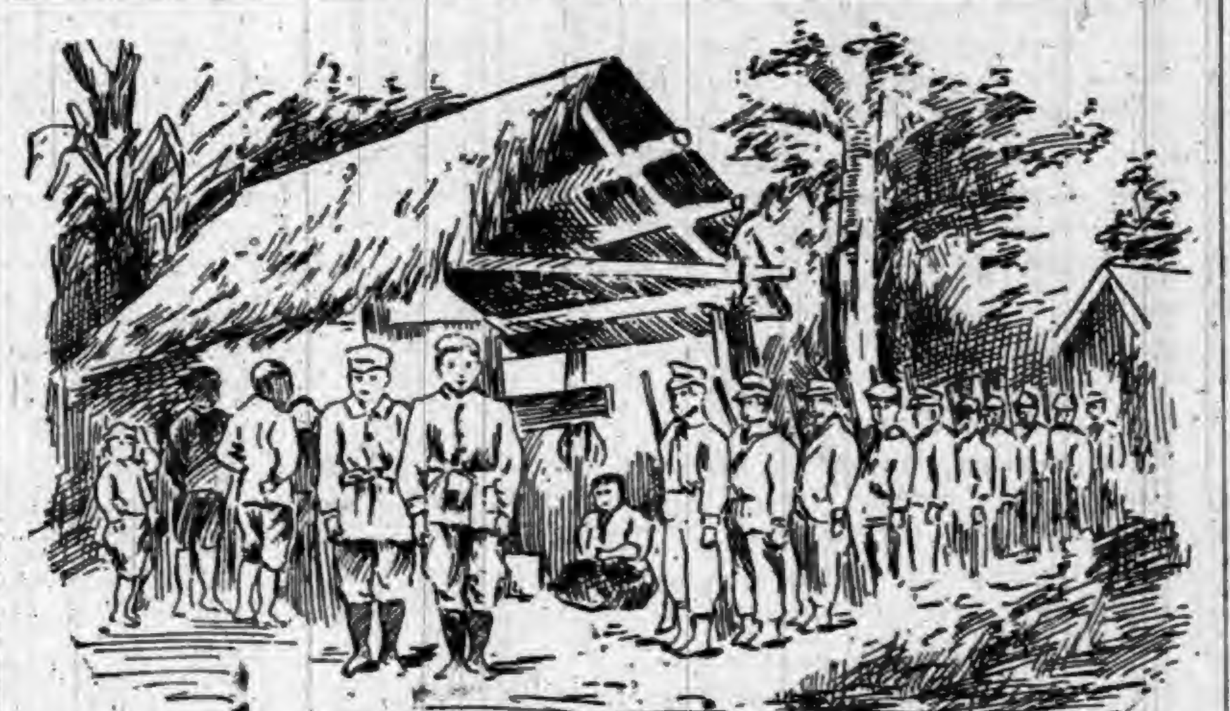
CONCEDES EVERYTHING DEMANDED BY THE FRENCH.

Yields to Prevent War—Blockade of the Coast Likely Now to Be Raised—Points Yet to Be Settled—England's Attitude Helps to End the Crisis.

Lost In a Fog.

The war clouds in the East have lifted. The government of Siam, disappointed at not receiving the support of Great Britain on which it reckoned, has surrendered unconditionally and granted every demand in France's ultimatum. Late advices from Bangkok state in effect that the Siamese Government, learning that France regards its reply to the ultimatum as a refusal to grant the French demands and being most desirous of maintaining peace, has telegraphed instructions to the Siamese minister at Paris to inform M. Develle, the French foreign minister, that Siam accepts the ultimatum in its entirety. The dispatch adds that the Siamese Government hopes that the blockade will cease, that diplomatic negotiations will be resumed and that an early settlement of the troubles will be effected.

A London dispatch says that Lord Rosebery's statements on Thursday foreshadowed Siam's surrender. After his speech it was felt that Siam had no other alternative. The only question was the possession of the provinces on the northeastern side of the Mekong, and it is currently reported that Lord Dufferin has secured a settlement by consenting to Siam handing these provinces to France on the distinct understanding that France shall immediately restore them to Siam and that the buffer state between France and English territories whereon England insisted shall be preserved. The feeling in the bellicose Paris press was against any arrangement with England, but the French government is doubtless delighted at being able to emerge from a serious situation without complications with Great Britain and with a full pound of flesh from little Siam.

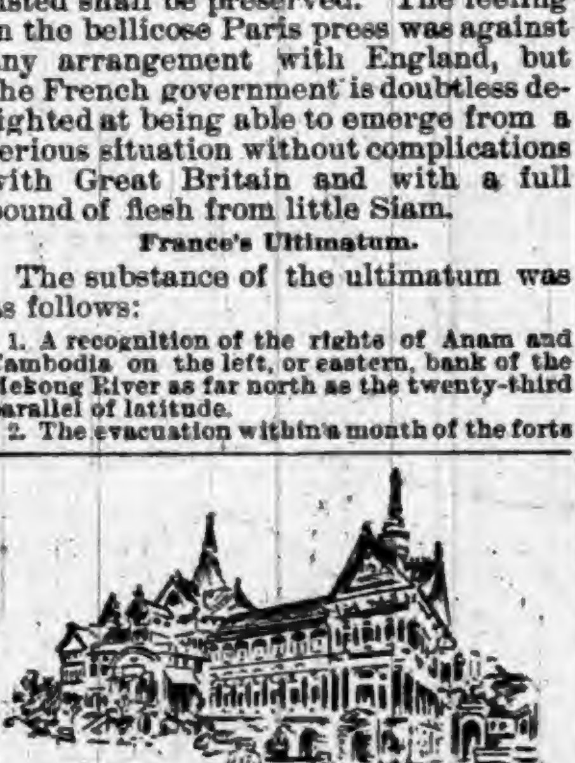


A SIAMESE MILITARY POST IN THE DISPUTED TERRITORY.

France's Ultimatum.

The substance of the ultimatum was as follows:

1. A recognition of the rights of Anam and Cambodia on the left, or eastern, bank of the Mekong River as far north as the twenty-third parallel of latitude.
2. The evacuation within a month of the forts held by the Siamese on the east bank of the river.
3. Full satisfaction for various Siamese aggressions against French ships and French sailors on the Menam River.
4. The punishment of the culprits and provision for the pecuniary indemnity of the victims.
5. An indemnity of 2,000,000 francs for various damages sustained by French subjects.
6. The immediate deposit of 3,000,000 francs to guarantee the payment of the fourth and fifth claims or the assignment of the taxes in certain districts, in lieu of the deposit of 3,000,000 francs.



ROYAL PALACE AT BANGKOK.

This ultimatum was sent on July 19, and forty-eight hours were allowed for Siam to make answer to the French demands. On July 21 M. Pavie, the French minister at Bangkok, presented the ultimatum to Prince Devawongso, the Siamese minister. On July 23 Siam replied, stating that the King was at a loss to understand what the rights of Anam and Cambodia were on the left bank of the Mekong River. The King expressed his willingness to abandon all the territories over which the existence of these rights could be proved and called attention to the fact that five months previously he had proposed to submit all the contested territorial questions to international arbitration. In the interests of peace, however, the King offered to surrender the territory as far north as the eighteenth degree of latitude, but no further, and proposed that the islands in the Mekong River be used in common by Siam and France. All the other points of the ultimatum were conceded.

CITY OF BANGKOK, TOWER OF THE GREAT PAGODA ON THE RIGHT.

This answer was not satisfactory to France and subsequently M. Pavie withdrew from Bangkok on a gunboat, and the French warships in the Menam River went to Koh-Si-Chang, an island near the head of the Gulf of Siam, where they joined the French fleet under the command of Admiral Humann. France then determined to blockade the Siamese coast. There was serious doubt as to the time the blockade was to be made effective. The French government informed the British Government that the blockade would begin July 31, but the British Minister at Bangkok later informed the British Foreign Office that it had commenced on July 26. Lord Rosebery, the British Foreign Minister, asked the French Government for a prompt explanation of this conflict in dates, but the answer has not yet been made public. With the acceptance of the ultimatum by the Siamese Government the war cloud in the East, of course, passes over.

LOST IN A FOG.

The Whaleback Steamer Christopher Columbus Loses Her Bearings.

THE CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS.

Lost in the thick fog which hung over Lake Michigan the other night, the whaleback steamship Christopher Columbus was obliged to sound its way into port, returning to Chicago from Milwaukee. It arrived three hours late. In the fright which ensued among its great load of 3,000 passengers an unknown man fell into the lake. Rumor quickly spread among the frightened thousands that the boat was running dangerously near shore. With each contradiction a more serious rumor would run over the boat, until accidents from frequent stampedes to different places on the boat were narrowly averted.

MONEY TO MOVE CROPS.

How to Raise It Under the Present Stringency Is the Question.

The question of how to move the wheat crop of Minnesota and the Dakotas for 1893 is becoming one of great seriousness. Owing to the financial stringency, the borrowing power of the grain men has become very limited. The country banks will not lend, and the money to be had is but a mere fraction of what has heretofore been used in moving the crops. Various plans have been suggested whereby the effects of the stringency may be obviated as much as possible. Any plan that will result in the moving of the crops, even though it be done very slowly, must be acceptable. Such a plan has been proposed and is being adopted in some parts of Southern Minnesota. The plan, according to a St. Paul dispatch, is that the grain men issue their checks for grain purchased of the farmers, payable fifteen days after date, which would allow time for the collection of drafts against consignments, but will only enter such drafts for collection. Even with this arrangement the crop must move very slowly and farmers who are obliged to sell may find themselves much inconvenienced.

MET A HORRIBLE DEATH.

Another Frightful Street Car Accident Occurs in Chicago.

The carelessness of an alleged inventor who had been experimenting with a new "protector" device upon the Taylor street bridge in Chicago caused a frightful street car accident that resulted in the death of one woman and the serious injury of three others. The oaken tightening lever at the east end of the bridge, which serves to reduce the vibrations of the structure under a heavy traffic strain, swung loose as street car No. 91 passed on to the bridge, and tearing through the backs of several vacant seats in the open car it spread death and misery in its path. The case of Miss Riordan, who was impaled, was horrible in the extreme. It was found necessary to remove her to the hospital with the portion of the oak stake—that penetrated her side—remaining in her body. A physician said that to withdraw it would mean almost instant death from hemorrhage. A saw was obtained, and by its use Miss Riordan was released from the pinned-down position. At the hospital the suffering woman revived sufficiently to take a tearful farewell of her friends and to receive extreme unction. Death came soon after the impaling stake was withdrawn.

Bridgetender Timothy Guerin places the responsibility for the accident upon an unknown "inventor," who was experimenting with a new device for tightening the bridge when it is closed. He left the fatal lever unfastened and the jolting of the car caused it to fall and rake the seats.

CAPT. RYDER, of the steamer Berkshire, from Baltimore, arrived at Providence, and reported that while off Long Island he encountered a heavy snowstorm that covered the deck of the vessel, and it became so thick that he was forced to lay to until it abated.

J. A. VICTORY, a farmer near Fort Omaha, fired two charges of shot into a party of sixteen Indian soldiers who were robbing his orchard, wounding several. He narrowly escaped being lynched, a scout armed with two revolvers standing off the Indians until troops arrived.

AN UNCONSCIOUS CRIME.

A Story Written for This Paper by William Westall.

CHAPTER IV.

The morning was fair and myself in high spirits, for I was going to see Miss de Souza, and I inferred from her brother's silence on the subject that his fears and mine touching Delmar's supposed designs were proving groundless. True, my friends were going away, but they liked Paris so well that I felt sure they would soon return

I started at 10, a world too soon, but by loitering on the way and making a few detours I contrived to arrive at my destination not many minutes before the appointed time. After exchanging bon jours with the porters and Mme. Mijoux, the landlady, I went up stairs. My friends' rooms were on the first floor, en suite. Delmar's bedroom was on the second floor (No. 56).

The de Souzas were waiting for me, and as I went Marie rang the bell for breakfast. She looked as bright and happy as usual, but her brother was pale and heavy-eyed and complained of headache. His sister suggested that a walk would do him good and proposed a stroll in the Bois, a proposal to which I assented gladly and de Souza with seeming hesitation.

So soon as breakfast was over Marie went to her room to put on her things.

Two minutes afterwards there came a knock at the door, followed by Mme. Mijoux, looking flurried and anxious.

"Pardon me for intruding on you, M. de Souza. But M. Delmar—I am very much concerned about him—and you are his friend, and I want your advice as to what I should do."

"My advice will be quite at your service, Mme. Mijoux, when I know what has happened. I suppose something has happened."

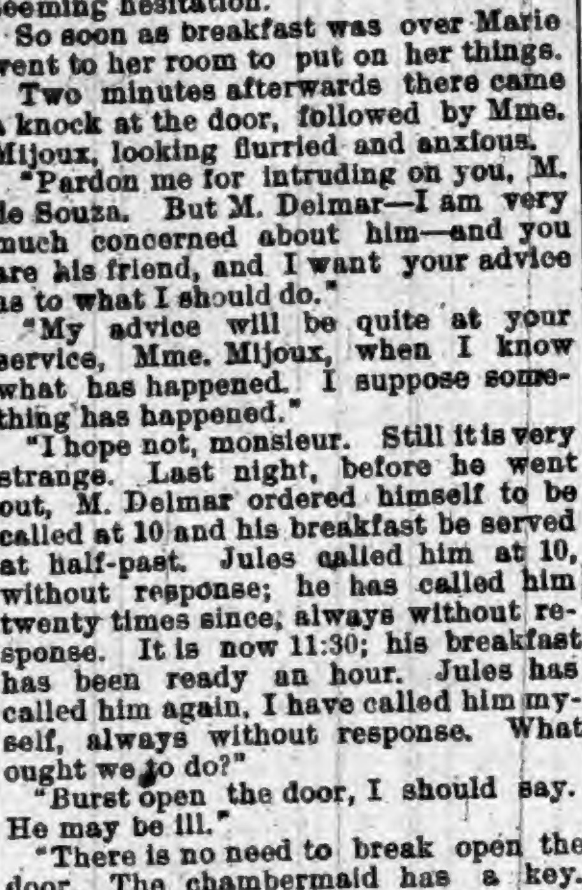
"I hope not, monsieur. Still it is very strange. Last night, before he went out, M. Delmar ordered himself to be called at 10 and his breakfast be served at half-past. Jules called him at 10, without response; he has called him twenty times since, always without response. It is now 11:30; his breakfast has been ready an hour. Jules has called him again, I have called him myself, always without response. What ought we to do?"

"Burst open the door, I should say. He may be ill."

"There is no need to break open the door. The chambermaid has a key. But if he is well and simply very fast asleep he might be vexed. I thought you would, perhaps, kindly——"

"Go in? Certainly. Where is the key? Come along, Davenport."

The key was brought and we mounted to the next floor. Before attempting to open the door we knocked vigorously and shouted our loudest.



"MY GOD, LOOK AT THAT."

"Something wrong here," said de Souza as he put the key in the lock.

We went into the room together, leaving the landlady, Jules and the chambermaid in the corridor.

"Why, he is fast asleep still. Wake up, old man. My God, look at that!" Then I saw that the bed-clothes were smeared with blood, and a thick pool of it was coagulated on the carpet.

"He has either been murdered or broken a blood vessel," added de Souza, bending over the body. "At any rate, he is dead."

"Suicide, perhaps."

"No. The wound is there between the shoulders. It is a case of murder. Don't disturb anything. Jules, go to the nearest police station and tell them what has happened—go running. Nobody must go in until the police come," locking the door and putting the key in his pocket.

"A murder in my house! Oh, mon Dieu! mon Dieu! I shall be ruined," cried Mme. Mijoux, wringing her hands. "What shall I do? What shall I do?"

Here Miss de Souza came up, looking much more frightened than grieved, I was glad to see. After telling her that it was really true Delmar had been murdered, her brother advised her to return to their own apartments, which she did promptly.

Presently a commissary of police and two gendarmes arrived, followed at a short interval by a juge d'instruction and a surgeon. The magistrate, aided by the surgeon, drew up a proces verbal, and questioned everybody who could throw light on the affair. De Souza told all he knew, which was very little, no more, in fact, than I knew myself. Mme. Mijoux and the chambermaid knew nothing. The night porter, who should have been an important witness, was just as ignorant. M. Delmar went out at 7 on the previous night, but at what time he returned the man could not tell. He slept in an alcove, near the front door, which he opened with a cord to any of the guests who rang the bell and gave his name. But as he had acquired the habit of performing this duty automatically, and invariably fell asleep again the next minute, he could give no information as to the murdered man's return.

The position of the body and the nature of the wound left no doubt that Delmar had been killed while he slept—in the opinion of the surgeon, about 3 or 4 o'clock—with a long-bladed, sharp-pointed knife.

Save for a few pieces of silver, the victim's pockets were empty. His watch was under the pillow. The door had been locked, of course, from the outside, and the key taken away.

When the proces verbal had been drawn up, and the preliminary investigations completed, the juge d'instruction, to whom de Souza was well known, asked him what he thought of the affair.

"Obviously a case of murder; its motive robbery; possibly revenge."

"Revenge! Ah, you know something of the victim's antecedents then?"

"I have no doubt," said de Souza, after telling the magistrate what he knew of Delmar, and mentioning the latter's visits to the Club and his skill as a gambler, "I have no doubt that he went to the Club last night and won as usual. In that case, and you can easily find out whether I am right, is it not at least conceivable that his antagonist followed him here, and with one stroke of the knife retrieved his losses and avenged his defeat? Ruined gamblers don't stop at trifles; or some onlooker or outsider, who knew that Delmar was in the habit of going home with money in his pocket, may have done the deed. Another supposition that suggests itself is that the murderer is an inmate of this house."

"At any rate, he must well know the ways of the house and the situation of M. Delmar's room."

"Knowledge easily obtained by inquiring at the office and passing a night in the house as guest."

"And about the door? It was opened with a key."

"That would be easy. The lock is not complicated, and who knows that Delmar did not leave his key outside? I know I often leave mine outside."

"It is possible, and the chambermaid has, of course, a duplicate."

"This is no woman's work, M. le Juge."

"But the woman may have an accomplice, either in the house or out of it. For the moment, however, we know nothing positive except that this gentleman has been murdered. We want facts. I shall place all the inmates of the house, guests as well as servants, under surveillance—unknown to themselves, of course—and without even informing Mme. Mijoux. I shall also ascertain whether M. Delmar was at his club last night, what happened there, and what time he left. And should any further idea occur to you, M. de Souza—above all, if you observe here any suspicious sign—kindly let me know." And then the magistrate and commissary went away, leaving one gendarme on guard at the door of Delmar's room and two at the street door, which was already beset by a crowd of idlers and busybodies.

"I have feared for a long time that Victor Delmar would come to a bad end, but I little thought he would be murdered in Paris, almost in my own presence," said De Souza pensively. "He was not a good man, but that is no reason why I should not use every effort to bring his murderer to justice. It is an interesting case, too, and I shall not be surprised—— You remember our conversation at the Cafe Anglais. I have a feeling that this will be added to the long list of undetected crimes. But I must go and cable to New Orleans."

While de Souza went to the telegraph office I went to the Chanticleer office and wrote a long and, as I flattered myself a vivid account of the murder, which caused even a greater sensation than the murder in the Rue de Bac, and proved a perfect godsend to the paper, for owing to my personal knowledge of the paper, my visit to the club, and my familiarity with the scene of the crime, we were able to give fuller details and more thrilling "word pictures" than any of our contemporaries.

CHAPTER V.

Inquiries made at the Club confirmed de Souza's surmise that Delmar was there on the night of the murder. He had gambled, won, and gone home, as usual, about three o'clock. But though Delmar was not liked, and it was supposed that he did not always play fair, there was nothing to show that any member of the club was privy to the murder. The last man with whom he had played cards, and from whom he had won the most money, could account for every minute of his time, from Delmar's departure to the discovery of the crime.

The night porter, the head waiter, and the chambermaid were arrested and examined; but, as there was not a particle of evidence against them, and they made no damaging admissions, all were released after a short detention. Wherefore, to O'Yea's chagrin, the boom did not last long. There was nothing to keep it going, and except by the police and a few others the "Crime of the Hotel Mijoux" was soon forgotten. Among the few others was Mme. Mijoux. Several of her visitors left, and though the room in which Delmar died was one of the best in the house no one would have it at any price.

"Why don't you come and live here?" said de Souza to me one day. "I wish you would."

"I wish I could. Unfortunately, I cannot afford to."

"Yes, you can, if you are not superstitious. Are you?"

"The idea of a sub-editor being superstitious!"

"Well, I have spoken to Mme. Mijoux, and if you will occupy Delmar's room for two months she will let you have it for nothing, and give you a good breakfast every morning into the bargain."

"Pour encourager les autres, I suppose?"

"Exactly. She thinks you will bring her la bonne chance" (good luck).

"All right. It's a bargain."

"When will you come?"

"To-night."

And I did, and the arrangements suited me to a T. It was a great saving, an important consideration in those days. I was also nearer to my work, and I saw Marie and her brother every day and dined with them at least once a week.

Shortly after I took up my quarters at the Mijoux she asked me whether I was not afraid of sleeping in "that dreadful room."

"Not the least. Why should I be?"

"Well, I know I should be. Of course, you are always careful to lock your door."

"I never lock my door on principle. I knew a man who always locked himself in his room. One night he was roused by a cry of fire, but the lock being hampered he could not get out, so had to drop from the window, thereby sustaining injuries that crippled him for life. Besides, I regard number fifty-six (Delmar's old room) as the safest in Paris. Who ever heard of two murders being committed in the same room within a few months? Its associations are a better protection than all the bolts and bars."

"I dare say you are right. It sounds very sensible. All the same, do you never feel nervous?"

"Never; and I sleep like a top."

"Well, I would not spend a night in that room—sleep would be out of the question—with the door unlocked for all Paris."

It was quite true. I did sleep soundly, but that night—probably from the effect of supping with O'Yea, Hertz and some other pressman, I slept badly. After dozing one hour and lying awake two, I rose, wound up the blind and looked out. It was light of moon, but the light was occasionally obscured by a drifting cloud. All was quiet in the street and the house. I was turning round with the intention of going to bed again and wooing sleep once more, when I thought I heard the door creak.

I listen intently. There can be no question about it. The door does creak, and I fancy I see it move.

Slipping into a dark corner between the bed and door, I await developments.

Slowly, slowly, the door is pushed open, and a shrouded and hooded figure glides noiselessly into the room and makes towards the bed. In the robber's right hand gleams a knife.

As he stoops to see where to strike I spring from my hiding place, dash the weapon from his hand and hurl him on the bed. The next moment, for he is too much surprised to struggle, I have him by the throat and on his back. Just then the moon emerges from behind a cloud, pouring a flood of light into the room, and in the ghastly face and terrified eyes of the midnight murderer I recognized the features of—my friend.

"You, de Souza!" and surprised in my turn, I relaxed my grasp and let him rise.

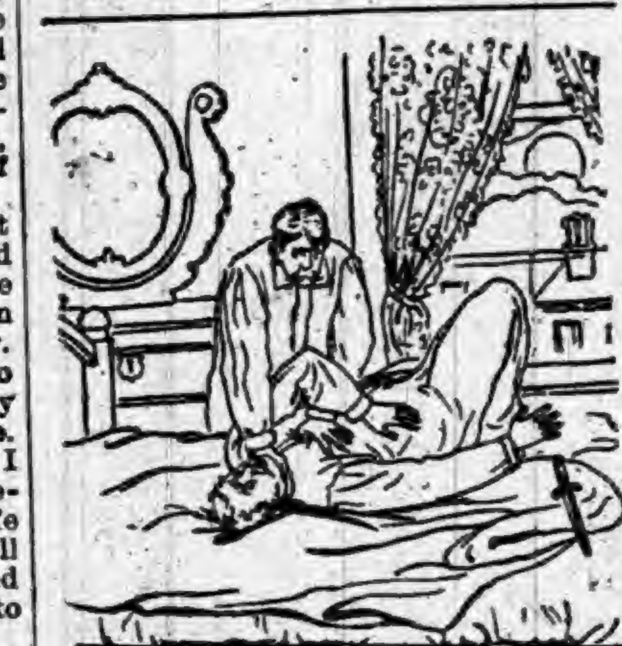
"Davenport! Davenport! You here! Why—what are you doing in my room? Why this violence?" he asks in a hoarse whisper.

"Violence! In your room! What do you mean? Are you mad? This is my room and you came here to kill me. Here is your knife" (picking it up from the floor). "Only a minute ago I dashed it from your hand as you were in the very act of striking."

"Oh, my God, what an escape for both of us! As He is my witness, Davenport, I knew not what I did. The last thing I remember before I found myself in your grasp just now is falling asleep in my own room. I am—I must be—a somnambulist. I have suspected it for several days, but I had no idea it went to this fearful extent. You yourself proved my susceptibility to hypnotism. Somnambulism is the same thing; and yes, there can be no doubt of it—I am the murderer of Victor Delmar."

"You! Impossible! You are raving!"

"I wish I were. I fear, however, that it is only too true. The other night I left a half-written letter on my desk. In the morning I found it finished, signed, addressed and stamped. I had fallen into the hypnotic condition and done it automatically and unconsciously. For years I have studied the psychology of crime and played the part of criminal investigator and amateur detective. I have considered cases—actual and imaginary—from every point of view. Without the remotest intention of committing crime, I have imagined how crimes might be committed without detection. I have had crime on the brain. My own psychological state became abnormal. You remember the conversation at the Cafe Anglais and how troubled I was about Delmar; he was always on my mind—and I killed him, killed him while we both slept. That is the only solution of the mystery. And now I have been repeating the past—'reconstructing the crime,' as the French say. Thank God you were awake, Davenport. Yes, thank God. Will you denounce me to the police? You may if you like."



"I HAVE HIM BY THE THROAT AND ON HIS BACK."

"Denounce you! Betray my friend! Good heavens, what do you take me for? Besides, there is no proof that you did kill Delmar. It is pure surmise. And how about the money? His pockets were rifled."

"I suppose I took the money to make the police believe that robbery was the motive—and hid it away somewhere. At any rate I have seen nothing of it."

"I think you are wrong after all, de Souza. I don't believe. Anyhow, this must be put a stop to. You might go sleep-walking into some other body's room."

"You are quite right. I shall go to the Alps, live in the open air and reinvigorate my overstrained nervous system. I shall also discontinue the study of crime and take up some saner and nobler pursuit. Meanwhile, I must ask you to lock me in my room every night. You will not tell Marie?"

"Of course not."

"And now, my dear friend, I want to ask you a very delicate question. If I am wrong I know you will pardon me, for it is prompted solely by a desire for your happiness. I have thought sometimes that you admire my sister."

"More, de Souza, I love her. You have asked me the question and I answer frankly; also I admit as frankly that it is the merest midsummer madness for a poor devil of a subeditor, with 75 francs a week, to think of love and marriage."

"I thought as much. But you needn't let any scruple of that sort stand in the way. Marie has an ample fortune and I am her sole guardian."

* * * * *

As touching my courtship I will only say that for once the course of true love ran smooth. A month later we were married in Switzerland. Philip was with us, for until he was radically cured of his somnambulism I was determined not to lose sight of him.

A few days after the wedding De Souza took me to his room—we were staying at Grindelwald. His writing-desk lay open on the table.

"I have been looking for some papers," he said, "which I put away ever so long ago and could not remember where. While I was looking I bethought me of a secret drawer in this desk, the very existence of which I had forgotten. I found my papers—and something else. See here!"

With that he opened the drawer, and I saw lying there side by side a bundle of bank notes, and a key with a copper label marked "No. 56."

[THE END.]

A Railroad Funeral.

"One of the most impressive funeral corteges I ever saw," said an undertaker, "was that of a railroad employe killed in the discharge of duty and whose remains were taken to Terre Haute, Ind. The funeral was a railroad affair entirely. The casket, shrouded in black, reposed on a catafalque set on the tender of a locomotive and following it at intervals of about one hundred yards came fifty massive locomotives all draped in mourning, and clanging muffled bells. The mourners on a long train of draped coaches followed all. It was a sight never to be forgotten."

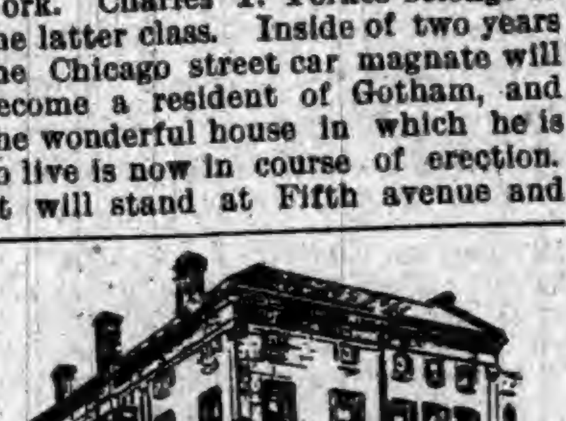
Man Sleeps Twenty Out of Fifty Years.

By the time a man reaches his fiftieth birthday he has passed 6,000 days or nearly twenty years in sleep. No marvel that a fellow sometimes rubs his head and wonders "where on earth the time has gone to?" Or, more correctly, under the new regime, "what it has been at?"

AN AMERICAN PALACE.

A Magnificent Residence Being Built by Millionaire Yerkes.

A Chicago paper says that some millionaires go to heaven when they leave Chicago and some go to—New York. Charles T. Yerkes belongs to the latter class. Inside of two years the Chicago street car magnate will become a resident of Gotham, and the wonderful house in which he is to live is now in course of erection. It will stand at Fifth avenue and Sixty-first street, New York, a palatial residence which will cost $1,500,000. The house will be of brown stone, four stories high, with artistic carving over the first-story windows. The elaborately carved main entrance will be approached by twelve steps, hewn from a solid block of brown stone, and will cost $20,000. The picture gallery will be 150 feet in length, and will be in the rear of the building. It will be one story high, with a glass roof. In this gallery will be shown Mr. Yerkes' famous $1,000,000 collection of old masters. The gallery will open into the big conservatory. The entire first floor of the mansion can be thrown into one room, for in place of the dividing walls there will be rows of pillars of carved Italian marble. Curtains hung between the pillars will take the place of walls. So when this immense floor is thrown open and the picture gallery curtains drawn there will be a ball-room surpassing anything in this country. In one corner of the great conservatory will be a large fountain, with a basin of fancy marbles and a silver cupid. Mr. Yerkes will support an orchestra of his own. The musicians will play for the delectation of the cable-king's family and guests at his dinners, receptions and balls. Mrs. Yerkes bathroom will cost $30,000. The ceilings in the principal rooms will be painted by French artists. The dining-room ceiling, on the first floor, will cost $10,000, and will represent a hunting scene and a banquet after the hunt. There will be an electric elevator in this private residence. Electricity will play an important part in the decorations. The lamps will be hidden, no lamps or globes appearing in sight except in the main parlor, where a chandelier will be suspended.



MR. YERKES' HOUSE.

Housekeeping on Fifth Avenue.

There is a pleasing side to the warm season in New York. The swells have gone to watch the breakers at the seaside, or have retreated to the mountains to get nearer the sun and keep cool in high altitudes. They could not leave their homes unguarded, and are paying big prices for decent occupants. June is the month of roses and marriages, and there are many brides and grooms spending the summer in fine brownstone houses on Fifth and Madison avenues. It is no longer a case of "love in a cottage," with meals forgotten and rent always due. As much as $40 per month is paid to guardians who will live in the homes of the rich. Servants not needed in summer homes, but reserved for the fall, are given to young people who will occupy vacated homes. Couples get a start in life, with a bank account begun, and spend their honeymoon surrounded with every luxury. The innovation is a reciprocal arrangement that suggests the millennium.

In the past, servants left to guard households entertained the policeman on the beat and his friends. Fine homes were soiled by muddy feet; plumbing was disorganized, through the stealing of lead pipe; wine cellars were dried, and an out-of-town summer sojourn meant a return to a ruined home. To-day, with love guarding, beautiful homes are made more beautiful, and master and protector are equally pleased and benefited. The owner goes to the country. The guardian bride and groom stay in town. The former has the advantage of recreation, and the latter enjoys the comfort that could not be obtained in any other way.—New York Herald.

Sizzard.

Baltimore American: The word "sizzard" has been invented to apply to such weather as Baltimore has had. It is not a great addition to the English language, but, at the same time, it has an expressiveness about it that will probably make it very popular before the summer is over.

Rome (N. Y.) Sentinel: A new monstrosity of language is the alleged word "sizzard." It is a combination of "sizzle" and "blizzard." It means one of those rare June days that are decidedly well done. In construction it is as bad as "electrocution," but the word will probably some day have a place in the dictionary. English as she is developed certainly discloses fearful and wonderful characteristics. On a scorching day we can appreciate the "siz" part of the new word, but the last syllable is so suggestive of a winter in North Dakota as to seem out of place. If peculiar features of the elements are, however, to be described by words ending in "zard" we may call a good thunder-storm a "blitzard." That can be traced to the German.

Philadelphia Press: "Sizzard" is a new word with which the New York World decorates its pages. It fills a want felt each month of the American summer, and will, we are inclined to think, have wide popularity and a long one. We are now in the thirteenth year of "blizzard," which first appeared in the winter of 1880-81 as a new word, and had quite as much against its reception as "sizzard."

Female Pirates.

Two of the most extraordinary of the pirates who formerly scourged the waters of the West Indies were women. One of them was Mary Read. She was a native of England, and had been dressed as a boy from childhood for the purpose of hiding a family secret. At one time she served on a British war vessel, where her sex was not suspected. Finally she took passage on a ship bound for Cuba, which was captured by a pirate. Having nothing better to do she adopted the piratical trade. One of her cut-throat shipmates was Annie Bonny, who was likewise disguised as a man. Anne, not imagining that Mary was a female, fell in love with her, revealing her own sex. Mary was thus obliged to make a similar revelation. These two extraordinary persons took their part with the men in every conflict. The facts regarding them are perfectly well authenticated. While fighting bravely, their ship was at length taken by a war vessel. They were tried for their lives at Jamaica, where Mary died in prison. It is not certain what became of Anne, but she was not executed.—Globe-Democrat.

Tobacco and Sight.

The bad effect of tobacco on the eyes was unknown, even by physicians, until within the present century.

Sixty years ago Doctor McKenzie, of Glasgow, wrote, "I have already had occasion repeatedly to hint my suspicion that tobacco is a frequent cause of amaurosis"—complete or partial blindness. To one form of this disease Hutchinson gave the name "tobacco amaurosis," because he often found it in men strongly addicted to the use of tobacco.

Doctor Williams, the celebrated oculist of Boston, says, "To be of service, treatment in tobacco amaurosis must be begun in the early stage, before the congestion has been succeeded by atrophy."

Doctor Francis Dowling, of Cincinnati, within a few years tested the eyes of one hundred and fifty employes in the principal tobacco factories of that city. Only one woman was found to be suffering from the disease, and she had never used tobacco. This showed that merely working in the factory had very little effect on the sight, though it did affect unfavorably the general system.

Of the men examined, forty-five showed more or less evidence of amaurosis, thirty of them being pretty well marked cases. They all mistook red for brown or black, and green for light blue or orange, and in all there was also a contraction of both pupils. Thirty out of the forty-five complained of a gradual failure of vision.

In one case—not among the employes just spoken of—the contraction of the pupil was so great that the sufferer was unable to go about without assistance. He had smoked from twenty to thirty cigars a day. He renounced tobacco, and his sight was fully restored in three and one-half months.

Chewing has been found to be much worse than smoking, as more of the poison is absorbed.

The ophthalmoscope shows, in the early stage of the disease, a congested condition of the optic disk and the retina. The pressure thence resulting at length causes a gradual atrophy of the disk, and eventually of more or less of the retina, according to the duration of the disease and the amount of the infection.—Youth's Companion.

How the Indian Prays.

"Prayer is the soul's sincere desire, unuttered or expressed." And the manner of expressing desire may differ widely. The Indian may be as religious as is the Presbyterian, yet he never kneels when he prays. He never addresses the Deity by word of mouth at all. Yet he asks for the blessings he needs, and asks for them with as much faith and as much reverence as does his whiter brother. They want a good corn crop, and they gather a handful of green twigs or grasses, bind them together with a reverent faith that the Deity is willing and able to help them. They lay the emblems or hang them in a place where the sun will shine upon them, and leave, assured that their prayer has been heard. It may not be answered. The corn may not prosper right away, but they are in no wise discouraged. They bind together another emblem and offer it in another place. Some places have particular favor. It is believed the Deity sees them place them there better than in some other place. It is simply the Christian's idea of sanctuary in another form.

He Was from Philadelphia.

One of the best of recent stories at the expense of the average inhabitant of the Quaker City is told by Lew Dockstader.

"I was walking through Twenty-third street the other afternoon," he says, "when a man toppled from the roof of a six-story building, and came whirling down through the air, striking the sidewalk just in front of me. To my amazement he got up and began to brush off his clothing with the utmost unconcern.

"'That was a pretty big fall you had,' said I. 'Aren't you hurt?'

"'Nope,' said the man.

"'I can't understand it,' said I. 'A fall like that would have killed anybody else.'

"'Yes, I know,' said he, 'but, you see, I'm from Philadelphia, and I fall slowly.'"—New York Times.

A GREAT and good man has gone on record as saying that the person who reads the daily newspapers has the advantage of acquiring a practical education that will stand him in use for about all things he meets with in the ordinary walks of life. The New York World adds to this sentiment when it says that, frankly considered, the increase in the habit of newspaper reading must be adjudged to be altogether for good and for the enlargement and enlightenment of the popular mind. The newspaper-reading habit is one which grows by what it feeds on, and the newspaper is an apostle and missionary. More than all other forms of publication combined, it cultivates the habit of reading, and it is the wide prevalence of that habit which causes books to sell and circulate and gives to the magazines the phenomenal success they have attained in the last ten years. Our public schools teach all our people to read. The newspaper supplies them with profitable matter for reading and stimulates them to make use of the key of intelligence furnished them by the schools.

The Color of Anger

What is the precise color expressive af anger or rage? Novelists seem hardly to have settled the point as yet, if we may judge from the four passages below, taken from a recently published novel:

1 Page 9. "Adrienne suddenly appeared,, her face white with ager."

2 Page 29. "The little fellow was trembling with a blue rage."

3. Page 57. "Albert was choking wtih rage. He turned green in the face."

4 Page 173. "Rodolphe, who was of a very choleric temperament, passed instantaneously through all the colors of the rainbow."

Furs at the Fair.

From Harper's Bazar.

Another attrrctive exhibit at Chicago, is a collection of furs valued at more than $200,000 by the New York firm to which it belongs. This display includes not only fur mantles and cloaks, but robes, skins, rugs, fanciful pieces of novel designs, and many stuffed animals, especially a huge buffalo, with also heads of deer, leopards, lions and tigers. The gem of the collection is a cloak worth $17,500, made of Imperial Russian sable tails so well matched and of such unusual quality that the furriers have been ten years in gathering enough for the garment. A fringe of the tails is around the shoulders as a trimming, and the lining is of cloth of gold in a design woven for English kings of long ago. Another mantle, made of 92 skins of Crown Russian sable, is lined throughout with royal ermine. It is of large shape with an upper cape extending to the foot in front, and is said to be worth $13,000. For half this price is another sable wrap made of seventy-nine skins exquisitely matched, drawn out to nearly double their length in a new way, and sewed together with such difficulty that six months were required for completing it. Among garments within the reach of more moderate purses, are coats of moire Persian, the glossy black fur so fashionable last winter, made with full straight Empire back, the front having a jabot a collar edged with silver-fox fur. The greatest care is taken in lining these fur coats with some tasteful contrasting color of rich silk or moire, that of opal tints showing gleams of fire, of rose, and blue being most effective with black wraps. A second jacket of this fur has a deep collar of fox argente, with the same opal lining. Seal-skin garments are shown in graceful shapes: one clothing the wearer like an ulster has large gigot sleeves with an Empire collar and revers of sable, while a second has a chinchilla collar. A mantle of seal-skin thirty inches deep has an upper cape of silver-fox fur, and is lined with ermine. Jackets of seal-skin have very full sleeves, and a jabot collar, with glace silk lining. Sable tails outline other seal-skin collars. Mantles of seal-skin not more than 24 inches deep are given the effect of triple capes, the upper one being of chinchilla, the second of silver-fox and the lower lined with very rich brocaded silk. Very large muffs in 1830 style are shown in all fashionable furs—sable, seal, silken Persian, etc. These are made round and long. Flat muffs are of most graceful shape, and larger than any worn for several winters. Evening wraps are of velvet of rich colors, lined with ermine and trimmed with sable tails. The royal ermine is also made into wraps for carriage wear and for the opera. Merely for display is a parasol of ermine handsomely mounted and lined with ombre satin. Slippers of ermine are also shown for midwinter wear, and a bedspread of this royal fur is lined with velvet and has lace draped upon its edge.

Deliciors Mixed Pickles.

Let five dozen small cucumbers stand in strong brine for three days, writes Eliza R. Parker in a column of "Southern Receipts for Pickles" in the August Ladies' Home Journal. Wash through cold water several times. Put half a gallon of strong vinegar in a kettle with one ounce of mustard-seed, one of juniper berries, one of celery-seed, half a dozen pods of green peppers, two pounds of sugar, half a dozen small onions and a lump of alum. Let come to a boil, and pour over the pickles for three mornings, heating the vinegar each time. Put the pickles in wide mouthed bottles and seal.

THE AUBURN COURIER

OFFICIAL PAPER OF DeKALB COUNTY.

JAMES A. BARNS, Editor.

Registered at the Auburn, Indiana, postoffice as second-class matter.

THURSDAY.........AUGUST 3, 1893.

Gold is coming back to this country. Three or four millions are now on the way.

Ex-Mayor Denny of Indianapolis, has been nominated by the republicans for mayor of that city. He is the present law partner of Judge R. Wes McBride.

Judging from each republican paper we pick up, they don't like "Grover" and don't like to have him go fishing. These are important questions and of such vital interest to the people that we are glad to see them receive proper attention.

The Maumee Valley Monument Association is talking up monuments for the most noteworthy spots. One will likely be erected on the site of the old fort at Ft. Wayne, Ft. Meigs, Ft. Defiance, the battle of Fallen Timber, near Perrysburg, etc., etc.

The state fair at Indianapolis will be held Sept. 18 to 23, and it bids fair to be one of the best ever held. Some have got the idea that there would be none this year on account of the big fair at Chicago. But it will be held as usual, with an extra effort to make it a success. Send for premium list to the secretary, Chas. F. Kennedy, Indianapolis.

The repeal of the Sherman silver act may not bring us all the relief we need, but those who claim that its repeal would ruin the silver mining business, should stop and ask themselves what good the Sherman act has done to silver mining. Silver has been going down steadily since that act fairly got into operation. Could it be worse with the act repealed?

Congress convenes in special session in about a month. It will probably repeal the Sherman act for the compulsory purchase of silver. But this alone will not bring the relief we most need. The tariff laws should be so amended that we can have a wider market for what we produce. We have products enough to bring us all the money we need. It is not more money the country needs, but more outlets into which we may push our abundant products. We have plenty to sell, but poor markets.

No greater mistake could be made, than that "the banks conspire to hold money and make times hard, purposely." Banks would be silly to hold money "purposely." Banks make their living by putting their money out into circulation and getting interest on it. But if they keep it in their vaults it is dead capital, that does not bring them one cent. There is not a bank in the country that could exist in that way. The banks would be glad to put the money they now have lying idle into circulation, but for the fear that depositors, to whom a part of it belongs would come rushing in and withdraw their money. The banks have money it is true, but it hurts them worse to have it locked up, than it does anyone else.

To Secure Circulation.

Plans to secure bank bills and similar paper money will now loom up. The Kentucky paper says, make bills payable in whisky, because the longer whisky is kept the more valuable it becomes, while silver keeps getting cheaper. A Kansas man who owns a salt mine or well, has issued notes secured by salt. And now comes the Indianapolis Sentinel and suggests Indiana building stone as it improves in value as it grows old. Of course some of these plans are only jokes, but they are as sensible as some we have seen enacted into laws by dignified congressmen. Here is a chance for McNagny to gain fame. He might introduce a measure by which paper money could be issued, and the security therefor be the cheek of the three or four democrats who claim to own the party in DeKalb county. Here again we have a product that never grows less, and gets tougher by age and exercise.

Health and Happiness!

Honey of Figs is the queen of all cathartics; syrups or pills. One anticipates its taking with pleasure. No other remedy sells so well or gives such satisfaction. It acts gently on inactive bowels or liver, relieves the kidneys, cures constipation, colds, fevers, nervous headaches, etc, and restores the beauty of health. Ladies and children prefer it. Doctors and druggists recommend it. The Fig Honey Co. of San Francisco. Try a bottle. Only one cent a dose. Matheny & Gerke wholesale and retail agents for DeKalb county.

Subterranean Streams.

One day recently while Wash. Weaver was excavating a ditch on Fred Gappinger's farm northwest of Albion, he struck a subterranean stream which flowed with great pressure to the surface. It is thought that Mr. Weaver struck the stream that disappears some distance north of Albion. Through the district which the ditch is being constructed, a succession of swamps were situated in an early day, which have been drained in a later day. Previous to striking this gusher Mr. Weaver had the same experience south of Albion, and under similar circumstances, only that the flow of water was not quite so strong. There is a section of Noble county, however, that experiences a great drouth once in a while on account of these underground streams, but no wells have been known to fail during the summer months, that have been dug deep enough to tap one of these underground rivers.—Albion Democrat.

Stole Everything in Sight.

Rose is a daisy. We mean John Rose, now resting up and recruiting his wasted energies at the Hotel de Ralston on the public square. For some time our people have been missing various articles, but a week ago Sunday morning they missed an unusual number. Several found that the chairs they had left standing on their front porches or lawns had mysteriously disappeared. Several found that choice flowers were gone. But through the week no clue was found. Monday of this week, however, S. H Bartlett, of Newville, came up and informed Sheriff Ralston that he thought they had a thief down there, and from a description of things, the sheriff felt certain he had located the chair and house-plant thief. On going to Newville, he was shown the house where the man lived, or was preparing to live. The fellow, whose name is John Rose, seemed to know what the sheriff was after and slipped out at the back door and went to his wagon with the evident intention of getting a coat that had a revolver in the pocket. However, he did not find it in the wagon, for it was in the house and the sheriff was at his side about that time and put the handcuffs on him. The house showed an abundance of rocking chairs, fine house plants, etc., the result of his midnight industry. He asked the sheriff to let him change his coat and pants, so as to be more presentable. This was so reasonable that Mr. Ralston took the handcuff off one of the man's hands and let him make the change. He then asked if he might change his shirt and Mr. Ralston agreed to this. When the fellow found the sheriff's grip on him loosened, he made a wild dash for the door, which had only a screen to stop him, burst out, ran like a deer to a picket fence, which he cleared at a bound, and started off across the fields with the sheriff after him. He was a good runner and was not easily overtaken. Charlie Bartlett and N. Dean, who had been assisting the sheriff, and had entered the race with him, saw that the thief was likely to hold out for a long race, went back and got a rig and followed up with that, and came up in time to be of service in heading him off. He had hid in a swamp at one point, but finally came out and started again. The sheriff fired at him five times, but he paid no attention to it. At one place Mr. Ralston called ahead to some men at work, but they evidently did not understand him. In one case, where some men at work were going to stop him, he put his hand into his hip pocket as if drawing a revolver, and they believing he would shoot, let him pass on. At one time he tried to hide in a cornfield, but finally came out and struck for a small swamp. In the meantime, the sheriff had been picked up by B. F. Blair, who had got out his rig and joined in the chase. In this way they got ahead of the man and came into the swamp from the other way to meet him. Mr. Ralston could see the bushes shake as the man pushed through them, but could not see the man. When the two men met, the sheriff told him to halt, but he flourished the swinging handcuff and told the sheriff to stand back. Ralston concluded not to take any chances and struck the fellow a blow under the left eye that knocked him senses, the blood flowing freely. The other men were close at hand, and leaving them to care for the helpless man the sheriff started back a little ways to get his hat which he had lost. But when he returned the man was still unconscious. He was taken to a barn near by, and cared for, but did not fully recover his senses till they reached Newville, to which place he was taken. The race had extended between two and three miles, and all were tired out. He was given something to eat, and then brought to Auburn. Mr. Ralston hired Charlie Bartlett to take his [illegible] and bring the chairs and house plants to Auburn. The Sheriff had left here about 10 a. m. and the capture at the swamp was about 2 p. m. The sheriff's office presented the appearanc of a second hand furniture store. There were six rocking chairs and four fine house plants, that they believed belonged in Auburn. They were viewed that evening and next morning by many people. The flowers were very valuable and belonged to G. A. Bishop. Of the chairs one belonged to W. H. Rakestraw, one to S. S. Potter, one to Clerk Moody, one to A. J. Burke, one to Will Kessler and a fine hickory chair to Joe Link. All these parties came in during the evening and recognized their property. Among those who came to discuss the matter was James Griswold. It appears that the man had boarded at Griswold's a few weeks ago, but his actions became so suspicious, by coming in late nights, and by Mrs. Griswold finding a part of a ham in his room, that they made him leave. He also staid awhile at Mr. Ward's. At both places his wife, whom he had married near Summit about seven months ago, came and staid a day or two. It appeard that he was anxious to go to housekeeping, and so when he went to Newville he rented a house of B. F. Blair, but later took part of the house in which Mr. Dean lived, as the latter was going away soon, and there Rose could have the use of a barn. He had a long light wagon, and an old horse that he had bought of Jenner, in Auburn. With this rig he had been seen coming into Newville loaded with chickens, which he sold to dealers. It would now appear that he stole them, and all over the country we hear of great flocks of chickens having been taken. Besides the articles named there is a lap robe. He had also taken a chair cushion at James Pearce's, and one at Mrs. High's. One of the plants belongs to old Mrs. Hebel, and many small plants were left at the house in Newville, together with some good harness, some carpet, a buggy cushion, etc. Parties in Auburn had seen a suspicious rig going about town in the night, and one man claims he saw three persons in the wagon. Mr. Dean says a niece of his saw a man sleeping in the barn at Newville while Rose was at work there near him. The way the matter was exposed was that Dean, when he got up a week ago Sunday morning, about five or six o'clock, saw Rose drive in with a lot of chairs, etc, and thought it very strange. Later in the week he heard that chairs, etc., had been stolen in Auburn, and on Saturday he and Charlie Bartlett talked the matter over, and on Monday the elder Bartlett came up and informed the sheriff. Mr. Ralston at once got a description of the lost articles and started down there The result is very creditable to his skill and courage, as well as to his powers of endurance as a runner. The other gentlemen named, who assisted him, should also have a generous share of the honor of capturing the most promiscuous thief ever seen about here He claimed to have his home at Avilla, though his wife was living with her mother in the edge of Steuben county. It is said her name was Betts. Rose is about 22.

Tuesday the sheriff went to Ft. Wayne and arrested two men, who were believed to be pals of Rose, and yesterday took Rose down to identify them, as he had admitted that two men had been with him in stealing. But on meeting the men both sides refused to acknowledge that they knew the other, although there is no doubt they are of the same gang. So the two men were set free and Rose brought back to Auburn.

The Silver Legislation.

The late director of the mint, Mr. Leech, has an admirable article in the current number of the North American Review, entitled, "Silver Legislation and its Results."

The first act passed for the restoration of the silver dollar to to our currency after the law of 1873 was the act of 1878, which is incorrectly spoken of as the Bland law. The Bland bill was a free-coinage measure, and the senate amendment moved by Mr. Allison made it a purchase act, fixing the amount to be coined at at least $2,000,000 worth of silver a month.

This bill was passed under pressure from the silver miners, the price of whose product was falling. Under the act the government purchased 291,292,019 pounds of silver, for which it paid $308-190,262 The price declined, but the government made money under the operation of the law, for it coined out of the purchased silver $378,166,795.

Every effort was made to push these dollars into circulation, but without success until small certificates were issued. Then by reason of the retirement of the national bank notes the silver was absorbed.

But the law did not result in the expected benefit of the silver miners. The price jumped up at first to $1 20½ an ounce. This was on February 28, 1878, but on March 29, 1879, the price fell to 93 cents. By reason of this decline in the silver market the agitation for the free coinage of silver was renewed, and the act of 1890, known as the Sherman act was passed.

Under this law about 157,000,000 ounces of silver have been purchased, on which, at seventy cents an ounce, the government has lost about $40,000,000, for the increased purchase did not keep up the price of silver. The miners were again disappointed, lathough not nearly so much disappointed as they pretended to be, because if it had not been for the Sherman act they would have had no sure market for their product.

Not only did the Bland and the Sherman acts fail to increase or maintain the price of silver, but they have driven gold out of the country to the amount of more than $25,000,000. Moreover the issue of treasury notes against this bullion, has not increased the currency of the country. On June 1, 1892, the amount of money in circulation was $1,613,572,224 and on June 1, 1883 it was $1,596,121,901, a reduction of of $17,420,000.

Therefore, as Mr. Leech clearly shows, our silver legislation since 1878 has not brought forth any of the beneficial results predicted for it, while it has imperilled our credit abroad and at home.

Seiler Family Re-union.

The past week has been an interesting one on the old Seiler homestead south west of Hudson. The occasion was a reunion of the family, the various members of which are now scattered through several states. The affair was most successfully managed by F. P Seiler and his estimable wife, who since the death of father Seiler in 1888 have lived upon the farm with mother Seiler. All the members of the family were present except the oldest, a daughter living in Illinois. Cyrus, the oldest of the sons, who is operating in real estate in Elkhart, was present with his family. Michael, who has been for a number of years an instructor in the State Normal school, came with his family from Terre Haute. John H. the youngest of the family, came with his family from Akron, Ohio, where he is engaged in the practice of medicine. Frank, who is perhaps the best known in the county, lives upon the old farm, but he has opened an insurance and real estate office in the thriving new town of Ashley, where he now spends a part of his time.

The assembled company numbered nineteen. The meeting was in every way a joyful occasion, but especially as to the venerable mother who has long since passed the mark of three score and ten years. She enjoys good health, and looks forward to the annual gathering of her family as the most interesting events of her declining years. May God spare her life and health to enjoy many more reunions as pleasant as the one past,

After an absence of 15 years will again visit Waterloo every Saturday at Lock's Hotel, Waterloo.

His success in the treatment of piles can be amply attested by hundreds whom he cured during his former visits. I can cure any case of piles, no matter of how long standing, or how hopeless the case may be. The patient suffers no pain or inconvenience. In most cases one treatment is sufficient, which takes only a few minutes, and the time required for a cure is about two weeks, during which time the patient is not inconvenienced from business. 20tf

D. Dove brought in two additions to our stock of curios last week. One is a huge tusk that is supposed to have belonged to big hog owned in early days by Gabe Fair. Our older people will remember the long curved tusks so common among the razor-back hogs of those days. The other is a fine specimin of stone pestle, an implement used by the Indians to grind corn into meal. He found this one on the banks of the St. Joe, opposite Cedarville, and with it a bundle of thirteen steel ramrods, tied up in a bundle by a small chain. He thinks the ramrods were some of the spoils captured by the Indians, when they defeated Harmer in one of the two battles near Ft. Wayne. He gave some of them to his neighbors, and lost the last one when he moved a year or two ago.

Judge Powers reports quite a cyclone in his county last week. It was at its best at Crooked Lake, northwest of Angola, where it swept across the lake, tearing down trees on both banks. At the point where are the boat houses belonging to Judge Powers and other parties, considerable damage was done. Some parties were in the Powers building and were considerably shaken up, as the wind nearly overturned it. Several boats were blown clear out of the water or overturned. One man was in a boat at the shore, and tried to get up the bank, but could not, owing to the force of the wind against him.

Window draperies, baby carriages, toilet sets, carpets, furniture and lamps, are six lines of goods in which the Foster Furniture Co., of Fort Wayne, Lafayette and Terre Haute, Ind., and Jackson, Mich, are very extensive dealers. The assortment they show, the designs and quality of the goods, and the prices at which they sell cannot be matched, even in the largest cities of our country. The rapid extension of their business is the best indication you can have that when you want any of the above goods, your best interests will be best and most satisfactorily served, by making your purchases at one of their establishments. They are now shipping goods to all the surrounding states. S. C. SWINEFORD.

S. C. Swineford died at his residence here Tuesday night, August 1, 1893, at 11 o'clock, after a long illness. He was born in Ashland, Ohio, August 9, 1825, his age being 67 years, 11 months and 22 days. He moved to Auburn the latter part of March, 1866, and for over two years was engaged in the grocery business. On retiring from the grocery business he purchased the Weaver House, standing where the present Swineford House stands, and has occupied the premises since. In 1872, he erected the present brick hotel, and a few years ago added an extensive addition along the south side. October 15, 1867, he was united in marriage to Miss Susan Nichols, who survives him. During his long sickness he was patient and uncomplaining and spoke of the approaching change as one who is perfectly aware of its certainty, but of which he had no dread. He said, and it will readily be understood, that he had not knowingly wronged any man, and that his life had been upright in the sight of all men. In this, and more, his life-long acquaintances will bear him out, for he was a man of the highest regard for his word and for all his conduct. Auburn has truly lost a worthy citizen. The funeral services are at the residence to-day, August 3, at 3 p. m., conducted by Joseph A. Shade. The remains were taken on the evening train over the B. & O. to his old home at Ashland, Ohio, where he was laid to rest.

Court.

Work began in earnest Tuesday morning after the long harvest vacation. Many cases were called up, some of which were not yet ready. The first jury case was an old settlement matter between R. M. Lockhart and W. B. Maxwell, both of Waterloo. It was in regard to the furniture store that Lockhart sold to Maxwell. The jury were on hand in good shape, and toward noon were called up. They were S. Z. Dickinson, J. W. Jackman, W. H. McGiffin, W. S. Berry, Elmer Case, David Maxwell, E. Inhoff, Charles Imhoff, Joseph Cochran, Levi McBride, Wm. Knight and J. W. Beams. Among the attorneys we noticed C. J. Coats and A. J. Baxter, of Butler; W. H. Leas, Gen. Blair, C. M. Phillips and J. F. Shuman, of Waterloo. Of our own attorneys on hand are Judge McClellan, E. D. Hartman, J. E. Rose, J. H. Rose, W. L. Penfield, P. D. West, C. E. Emanuel, H. J. Shafer, all on hand and ready for work. Divorces were granted to John and Sarah Gingerich; Geo. and Jennie Bowman, and Frank and Edith Somerlott. The lady last named took the name of Edith Latson, and the same day a license was taken out for her to marry John G. Rohm. The Lockhart-Maxwell trial is now going on.

Saturday's Races.

Last Saturday quite a large crowd from neighboring towns and many from Auburn, assembled at the fair grounds to witness the races advertised for that date. Our representative was late on the grounds and consequently our account will be somewhat foreshortened There were some very good running races, and one in particular was worthy of special notice. This was the race between the sorrel running team from Garrett and the greys ridden by a young man named Finney, also from Garrett. The latter was considerably handicapped, but soon the two heats run. A stirrup or toe attachment was fastened to the back of each of the horses and in there he stood while going around the track at high speed. His "nerve" is greater than ours. There was also a race between a running mule and pony. The latter won. John Knoder's trotting dog was matched against another from Garrett, and again Garrett came out on top. "Taffy!" Baldock's pups were also on exhibition. There was an exciting half-mile bicycle race with a large number of entries. This was a handicap. Will Eckhart won easily. One of the most amusing events was a race between running dogs attached to little express wagons. They started in good style, but seemed to get jealous of one another's ability, and there was a collision, and one of the drivers was run over. A young man from Goshen offered to run fifty yards with anyone, or against the world's record. As there was no one to accept the challenge he did not run in the afternoon, but in the evening found a man willing to amuse him and left him so easily, the other fellow is still wondering where he was at.

FOUR German soldiers committed suicide because they had been inhumanly treated by non-commissioned officers. If the kaiser wishes to increase the efficiency of his troops, one of the first things to do is to remedy an evil that is goading so many of his soldiers to self-destruction.

BLESSINGS light on him who first invented sleep. It covers a man all over, body and mind, like a cloak; it is meat to the hungry, drink to the thirsty, heat to the cold, and cold to the hot. THE Infanta Eulalia has returned to Madrid, and she declares that she enjoyed herself hugely while in America, for all of which she returns her thanks. That is all that is necessary. The Infanta came over here for pleasure, and if she enjoyed herself it does not really make any difference whether the American snobs who ran after her were snubbed or not, and she probably doesn't care.

ONE of the Boston newspapers reports that a young girl in that neighborhood made a hearty lunch of ice cream, accompanied by a liberal supply of pickles. After her death, which occurred a few hours later, the doctor who attended her was interviewed, and informed the reporter that it was dangerous even for persons who could easily digest pork and beans and Boston brown bread to trifle with ice cream and pickles, the latter combination not being at all nice. It is a glorious thing to have the stomach of an ostrich, but it is fatal to abuse it.

PROF. BISCHOFF, of the University of St. Petersburg, published in 1872 a pamphlet, in which he maintained that the average woman's brain is far superior in every respect to a man's, this opinion being based on the fact that a woman's brain is generally about 100 grammes lighter. In order to further prove the truth of his statement he ordered that after his death his brain should be weighed. This was done, and those who believed in this theory were amazed to find that the professor's brain was lighter by five grammes than the brain of a woman of the lowest intelligence.

THE farmer, of all men, should take pains to encourage his boys if he wishes them to adopt the business of farming as they grow to manhood. He, better than one engaged in other business, can do this. What is the loss if a small piece of land rented to the boy does not produce quite so much as if the better divided skill of the father were used to direct its cultivation? What is lost in money is more than made up by the value of the experience gained. Let there be competition between an acre worked by father and another worked by the son, and the boy who can excel his father in growing a crop will, in so doing, acquire more love of farming than he can get in any other way.

IF the statement published in London that over 700 persons have died of cholera in Southern France since May is true, there is no evidence in such a mortality that the disease exists in a virulent or dangerous form. A death rate of twenty-five or thirty a day in a population of 5,000,000 is not like the work of Asiatic cholera where that fearful pestilence is epidemic in its most venomous form. Last year there was cholera at various places in the south of France long before the disease appeared in Hamburg, but it never caused a heavy mortality or spread far in any direction. The present condition of Marseilles and other cities on the Mediterranean coast calls for watchfulness, it is true, on the part of American quarantine officials, but the news so far received is not really alarming in any sense.

THREE Wellesley girls who were in a hotel fire are described coming out of the building dressed as if ready for a picnic, and having saved everything, even to a bag of peanuts. This seems to indicate a certain mental poise and equanimity of nerves which may be credited, for the time being at least, to the good effect of modern education of girls. It probably did not enter the minds of these gymnasium-trained and Greek-lettered girls to shriek and run about. They calmly got up and dressed and picked up their things and walked out of the blazing hotel. It is pleasant, however, to note that they dressed themselves with care enough to look ready for a picnic. The old doctrine that it is every woman's duty to look as pretty as possible under all circumstances receives the unconscious confirmation of these three maids from Wellesley.

FOR some months past farmers whose fields touch the Darby Creek in Pennsylvania have noticed that the bushes and small trees along the water's edge were dying. An investigation showed that the bark had been peeled off the trunks near the ground. Only the bushes and trees that overhang the creek are affected. The farmers thought it must be the work of rabbits, and, as the depredations extended for three miles, a wholesale raid upon the bunnies was planned. Herbert A. Enochs says that a timely and startling discovery thwarted the farmers in their crusade. With loaded gun a farmer sat by the stream to watch for the shrub destroyers, when he beheld a large carp leap from the water and catch at the bushes. It was after a fly that had lighted there, but in its endeavor to get it, tore off a considerable chunk of bark. Then other carp were seen doing the same thing. They had actually girdled all the bushes on the banks for miles in catching flies.

THE Scriptures tell us, in what is known as the Parable of the Talents, that a rich man, being about to depart for a foreign country, called his servants about him and distributed money among them according to their several merits. To one he gave ten talents, to another two, and to a third one. The talent was equivalent to about $1,600. When the master returned he called his servants again about him, and asked how they had used their money during his absence. The first two replied that they had gone into business and largely increased their capital; but the third, who had received the smallest amount, replied that "he was afraid" [of a panic] and went and "hid his talent in the ground." He rented a safe deposit box and stuffed his money into it. The lord of the manor didn't like this. He rebuked the patron of the safe deposit, and took his money away from him and gave it to the man who had made good use of ten talents. Thus endeth this morning's lesson.

A RAINMAKER at Goodland has got himself into serious trouble. A cloudburst in that neighborhood a few days ago destroyed the wheat crop of James Butler, a farmer, and caused a washout on the Santa Fe railroad. A train was wrecked by the washout and the engineer was killed. A. B. Montgomery, the Goodland rainmaker, claimed that he had produced the cloudburst, which came without warning from the barometer. Mr. Butler will sue Montgomery for the value of his wheat crop. The widow of the engineer will likewise bring suit against the rainmaker for $10,000 damages. The papers in both cases have been prepared and the progress of the trials will be watched with great interest. Inasmuch as Montgomery has publicly asserted that he brought about the storm which caused the disasters he will probably be estopped from denying his responsibility for the destruction of the wheat crop or the death of the engineer. There seems to be no reason why the plaintiffs should not recover full damages. When an individual assumes to take or actually takes the place of providence in the regulation of the weather, it is only fair and just that he should be held responsible for all damages that may result.

Too Many Holidays.

The refusal of the House of Commons to adjourn over Derby Day recalls a story related of one of the Roman Catholic peers who took their seats some four or five years before the passage of the first reform bill, after an exclusion of a century and a half. He gave notice that on a certain day he would make a certain motion, whereupon there arose from his noble colleagues a general cry of "Derby!" The astonished novice named another day, only to be greeted with an equally unanimous expostulation of "Oaks!" At this, he explained that he would ask the forgiveness of their lordships, but, having been educated abroad, he was forced to acknowledge that he was not familiar with the list of saints' days in the Anglican calendar.

Not a Kingly King.

Emperor William talks as if there were no other men in Germany but soldiers. He has much to say about the welfare of his people. "A kingly king is he who keeps his people free." Emperor William manifests more of the nature of a tyrant than of a kingly king.—Boston Globe.

FEAST FOR FARMERS.

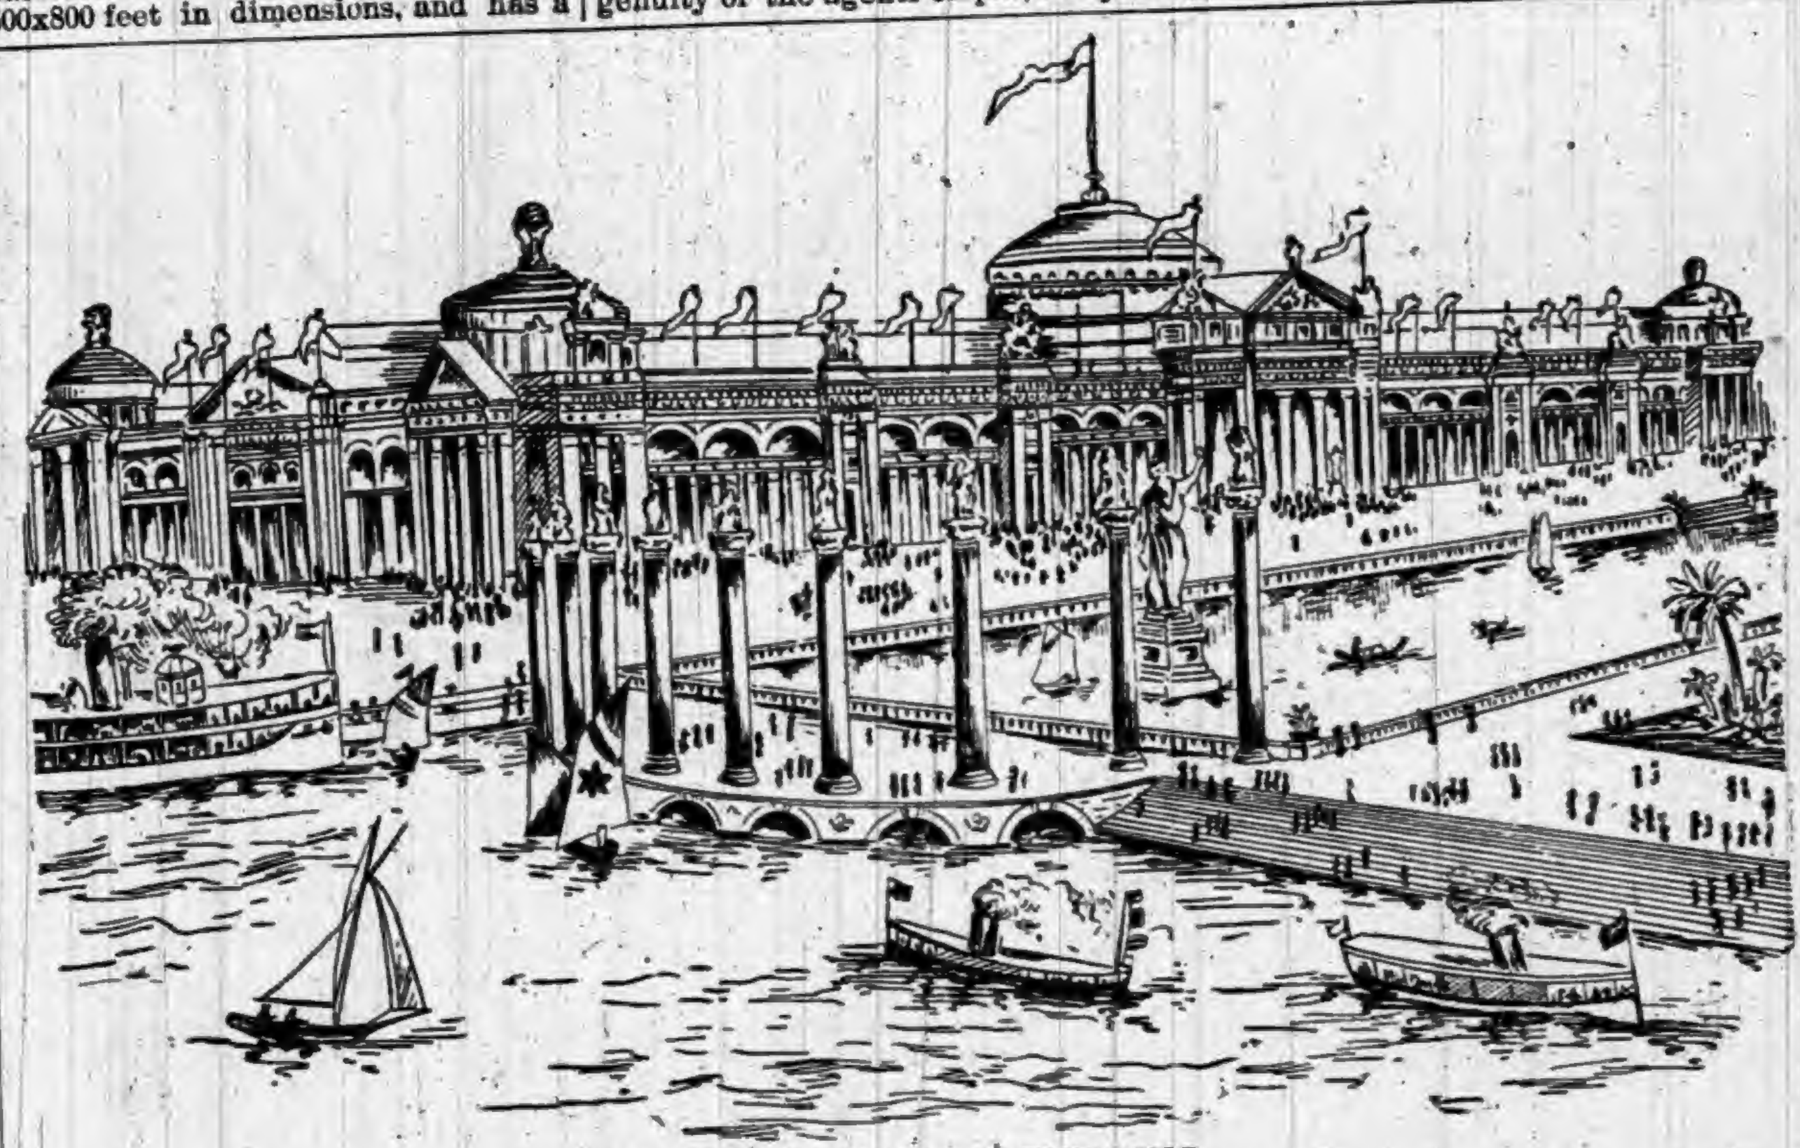
INTERESTING AGRICULTURAL SHOW AT THE FAIR.

Resources of All the Nations of the Earth Exhibited Under One Roof — Progress Made in the Cultivation of the Soil Practically Illustrated.

Mountains of Things to Eat.

TO the average mind an agricultural display suggests bushels of corn, stacks of oats, sheaves of wheat and the other naked products of the field. Primarily this idea is correct, but the world is far advanced beyond the primary stage. Every combination into which the food products enter or of which they can by any possibility form a part; every invention which tends to make the work of man easier in inducing the soil to yield up its favors; the liquids as well as the solids which are the result of man's ingenuity in compounding and mixing are shown in the Agricultural Building, with the result that effects are produced and combinations made that are bewildering.

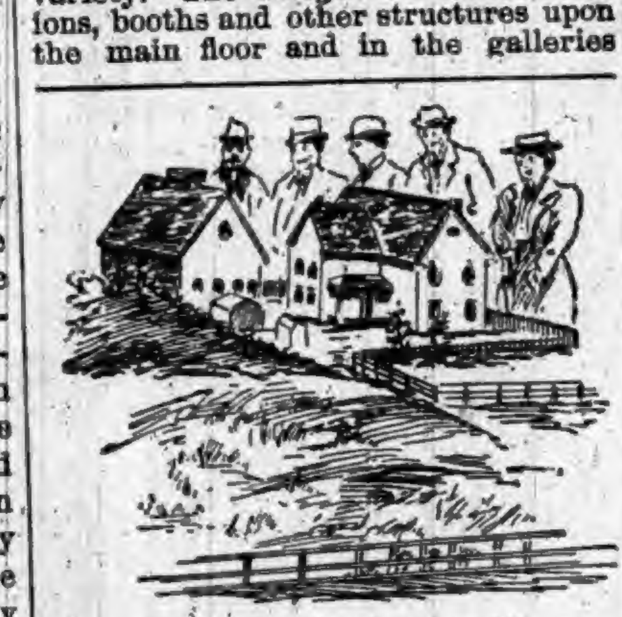
The style of architecture of the Agricultural Building is classic renaissance, and is situated near the shore of Lake Michigan and is almost surrounded by lagoons that lead into the park from the lake. The building is 500x800 feet in dimensions, and has a floor area of nineteen acres. On either side of the main entrance are mammoth Corinthian pillars, fifty feet high and five feet in diameter. This main entrance leads through an opening sixty-five feet wide to a vestibule from which entrance is had to the rotunda, 100 feet in diameter. The rotunda is surmounted by a glass dome 130 feet high. All through the main vestibule, and grouped about all the grand entrances, statuary has been placed, illustrative of the agricultural industry.



THE AGRICULTURAL BUILDING.

Size Rather than Beauty.

At first sight of the interior of the building, owing to the great variety of displays made, the visitor gains the impression of a mighty jumble of colors—a vast fair in which each exhibitor has sought to outdo his neighbor in the matter of brightness of adornment. The world has been ransacked for every imaginable article of food stuffs, and more than half the space under the great roof is taken up with the contribution of foreign nations. Everywhere there is a sense of crowding, of things put together in the very smallest space possible, but this is owing to the desire of the chief of the department to get all he could inside the walls. Symmetry of form has been sacrificed to this requirement, but such a defect will hardly be noticed by the average visitor. His desire for something huge will be gratified; he will see great stacks of product piled all around him and reaching high into the air; mountains of food stuffs on all sides. If harmony has not been obtained, however, there can surely be no complaint as to variety. The designers of the pavilions, booths and other structures upon the main floor and in the galleries have given full vent to their imaginations. Mosques, towers, castles, temples, pagodas and structures embracing every known variety of architecture crowd upon each other in pleasing confusion, and offer to the beholder a vision of what has been in the building line since the world began, and what may be expected in years to come where the laws and regulations regarding such things are lax.

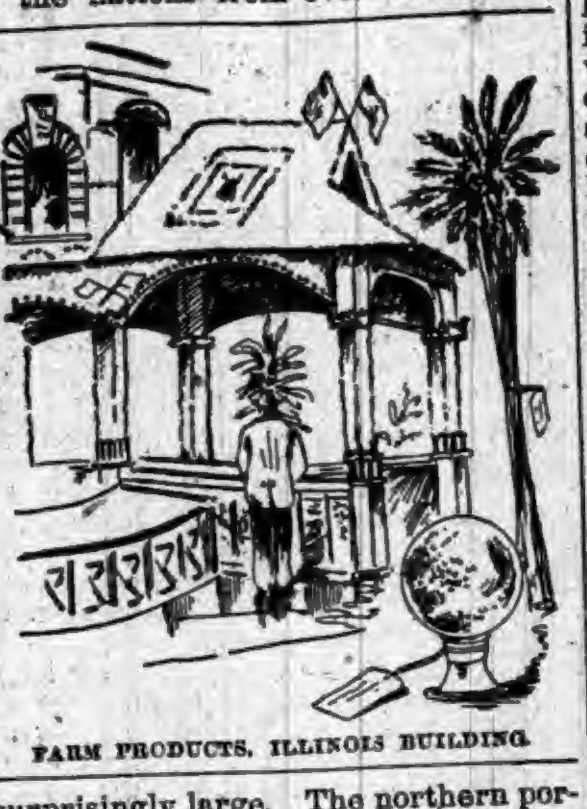


WASHINGTON'S MODEL FARM.

The main floor of the great hall is divided between foreign countries and States composing the great American Union. Other nations than the United States occupy the space north of the grand or central aisle, which runs east from the main entrance, and the various States are to the south of it. There is no reason why the visitor should be dazzled by the multiplicity of displays if he will but keep the plan of arrangement in his head. When he gets to the galleries it will be somewhat different, for there he will come across exhibits of every conceivable kind, representing the work of thousands of private individuals and presenting a bewildering array.

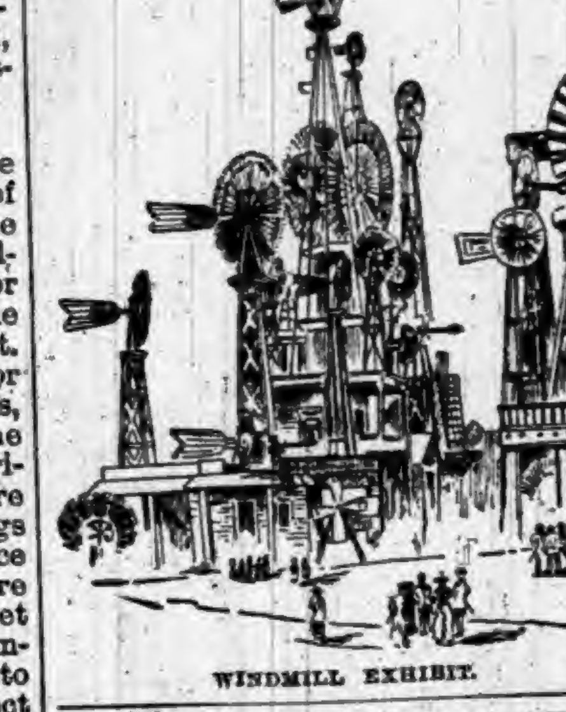
Europe's Contributions.

Naturally enough, the Agricultural Building is nothing more than a sample room for Mother Earth. It is essentially a business place. In the Horticultural Building are displayed Nature's fripperies and gewgaws, her ball gowns and reception dresses, but here is what is necessary to the life of man: the substantials, the foundations of his health and prosperity. Sweetness and light, however, have been imparted to the display by the trimming of its component parts into artistic forms, but on the whole, the man who enters the Agricultural Building does so with the idea that it is the place with which the life of the country is most closely connected and hence is more representative of the country than any other structure on the grounds. The displays of the nations from over the sea are surprisingly large. The northern portion of the main floor is devoted to the displays from Great Britain, Germany, France, Mexico, Austria, Denmark, Sweden, Japan, Canada, Paraguay, and other countries, each of which has been allotted space ranging from 1,500 to 15,000 square feet. Occupying nearly all the remainder of the space on the main floor is the exhibit of cereals and other farm products of the States of the Union.



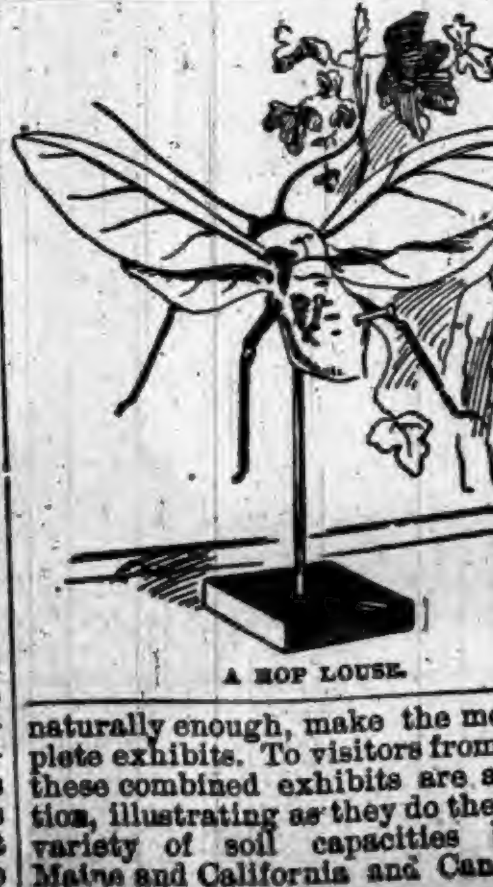
FARM PRODUCTS, ILLINOIS BUILDING.

There are many novel ways of showing commonplace exhibits, and the ingenuity of the agents employed by the commissions from many of the States has taken curotus and interesting forms. Many of the exhibits are the prize products of State and county fairs, so that it may be said that the Agricultural Building contains the very best of American prizes. Among the novelties is a typical Western farm, exhibited by the State of Washington, showing in miniature farm houses, barns, fences, fields of growing grain with manikins operating tiny gang plows in the furrows, threshers, binders and all other farm machinery. British exhibits contain specimens of grain from the English experimental stations, showing the effect of artificial fertilization on the various seeds. East India shows textile materials, such as hemp, jute, sisal, manila and flax, while South Africa, the Cape Town district, shows the products of its ostrich farms. Liberia, the only colored republic on the Dark Continent, has a curious and wonderful display of barbaric instruments and products, while the resources of Spitzbergen and the home of the Laplander are also displayed in great quantity if not in great variety. Curious food products from the tropics are exhibited side by side with the staples of the north, and the implements of the aboriginal farmers are placed in contrast with the perfected machinery of to-day.



WINDMILL EXHIBIT.

Every State and Territory is represented by its products. Upon this one floor, covering nearly ten acres, are displayed, in all their variety and perfection, the farm products of the world. On the six acres of flooring of the annex is shown every description of agricultural machinery in such a manner as to illustrate the progress of the industry from primitive times to the present. Nearly every State has its pavilion, although the Western States, naturally enough, make the most complete exhibits. To visitors from abroad these combined exhibits are a revelation, illustrating as they do the infinite variety of soil capacities between Maine and California and Canada and the Gulf. Missouri, for instance, has been at some pains to make a striking display. She produces the great St. Louis bridge in miniature, made of corn ear and wheat straw. The massive piers are of golden corn, the supports of cane and the model will be faithful to the very last straw. Louisiana has a complete exhibit that attracts attention. The New Orleans Cotton Exchange has sent cotton enough to supply a province. Kentucky boasts of producing more than half of the tobacco of this country, and it was to be expected that the weed would occupy a prominent place in her exhibit. This expectation is not disappointed, for the "weed divine" indeed occupies the post of honor. Tobacco leaves droop from the cornices and columns of the pavilion and are utilized in every possible way for purposes of decoration. Nebraska has imported a corn castle and corn is king there. Exalted on a pedestal in the center of the pavilion is the genial goddess of the corn plant. Cornucopias showing the products of the State adorn the walls, and the eight pointed arches of the pavilion are covered with corn in the ear. Vermont runs to maple sugar, and she shows this toothsome article in every variety and shape. Wisconsin has a pavilion that is a marvel. It is of Moorish architecture, and has more gaudy domes and pinnacles than can well be counted. It is a maze of embellishments crowded into a small area. Corn halved, quartered and cut into slits and fashioned in stars, diamonds, hearts, clubs and spades, all standing out in relief from a colored background, confront the visitor at all points. Illinois has a huge pavilion with wheat, corn and oats fancifully arranged in all parts of it, the idea evidently being to attract all the attention possible. Ohio has a gable-ended building in which to show her products, while Pennsylvania has occupied the space allotted to her with a dome-covered edifice. In making the rounds of the State pavilions, however, there is more or less monotony, even in the variety offered, unless the visitor cares to make a careful study of the displays made by the different States. The wheat growing, corn producing States, in the main, present the same features, although differently arranged and put together, perhaps; the tobacco and cotton States, and all the others which have a specialty, offer a surfeit.



A HOP LOUSE.

Agricultural Machinery.

In the southern annex to the Agricultural Building is a display of machinery representing the advances made from the time when men dug into the earth with sticks to prepare it for the reception of crops. The primitive plow is there, and by its side is the latest product of the inventive genius of man. There are also machines which gather up the grain, thrash it, bind it and do everything else save making it into bread. No one can really understand what has been done in the way of the improvement of agricultural machinery until he has seen and studied this exhibit.

The galleries are devoted entirely to the display of American food products in the manufactured form, and in the northeast section can be found an unusually comprehensive display of cereals, starches, canned goods, phosphates and the like. As individual firms furnish the bulk of the exhibits in this section, many of the displays are of the most elaborate description. The spirit of rivalry is very keen indeed, this being shown by the character of the various booths erected, and this business competition has led to the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars in ornamentation and adornment. Money has been lavishly, if not foolishly, spent in many cases in the fitting up some of the booths. There are no spaces in the galleries that are not filled. Honeys, spices, flours and dairy fittings and appliances test the capacity of this section, and the displays made of these products are both unique and tasteful.

Of more than passing interest to the public at large is the agricultural experimental station on the main floor in the southwest corner of the building, constructed upon the plans adopted by the United States Government for its stations throughout the country. It represents the entire work of a model agricultural experiment station, covering the whole field of experiment and research in crops, botany, horticulture, entomology, feeding stuffs, animal nutrition, dairy solids, milk-testing, and veterinary science, including an elaborate botanical, biological, and chemical laboratory. This exhibit will afford a vast amount of information which will prove of incalculable benefit to thousands. The crops best adapted to certain localities and the reasons therefor, the most improved methods of cultivation, how the best results may be secured—these are the lessons taught by this exhibit. The sights in the agricultural buildings make an optical feast for farmers.

Fraud in Marriage.

According to a recent decree of the Austrian courts of law, concealment of age on the part of a bride is sufficient to invalidate the marriage. An Austrian baron has succeeded in obtaining an annulment of his union in consequence of his wife's having pretended, at the time of its celebration, that she was fifteen years younger than her real age. It is the first time on record that a marriage has been dissolved on such grounds as these, and were this interpretation of the law regarding "fraud in marriage" to be accepted in other civilized countries, a very serious state of affairs would probably result therefrom.

Not for the Rituals of Civilization.

The religion of the ancient Egyptians had some features not to be found in several of the religions of these times. Here, for example, is a passage from a prayer to be found in the ritual for the dead:

"I know you, Lord of truth and justice; I have brought you truth, I have committed no fraud against men, I have not tormented the widow, I have not lied in the tribunal, I have not done any prohibited thing, I have not commanded my workmen to do more than he could do, I have not made fraudulent gains, I have not altered the grain measure, or falsified the equilibrium of the balance, I have not made others weep, I am pure."

Another man thus cries:

"I have given bread to him who was hungry, water to the thirsty, garments to the naked, and a home to the forsaken one."

Still another cries:

"I have protected the poor against the powerful, I have given hospitality to every one, I have been benevolent and devout, I have cherished my friends, and my hand has been open to him who had nothing. I have loved truth and hated a lie."—Swinton's Paper.

Her Mamma's Judgment.

"Yes, it was one of those things one would rather have left unsaid," confessed the tall girl in blue. "It was this way. I saw Mrs. Wilmarth looking at the game through the loveliest lorgnette, and I leaned over and remarked to her in my impulsive way:

"'O, Mrs. Wilmarth, do lend me your lorgnette, won't you? I have always wanted one, and mamma won't let me have one. She says they're so impertinent.'"

"And what did Mrs. Wilmarth say?" inquired the girl in brown.

"She handed over the lorgnette, and as I looked through it she said sweetly that, really, for the first time she believed mamma's judgment was right." New York World.

A Tremendous Shaking-Up.

This is what every system afflicted with chills and fever, bilious remittent, or any other form of malarial disease undergoes periodically. Not only is malaria terrible in itself—it is the breeder of an infinity of bodily ailments. Specifics used for its prevention and removal prove, in the vast majority of cases, useless for every other purpose than to mitigate the disease and stave off its attacks. They are sure, with the average treatment, to return after awhile. The sufferer may change his location to a healthier one, but the complaint, which is in his blood, is not thus lightly got rid of, and returns after the wonted interval. Organic affections of the nerves, heart trouble, general debility of the system are the offspring of malaria. Cure the originating cause and avert future physical injury with Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, efficacious also in liver complaint, inactivity of the kidneys, rheumatism, and indigestion.

Too Far Off.

He had wandered about into dozens of stores hopelessly trying to match a piece of goods for his wife. At last he quit and leaned up against a post with the sample in his hand.

"What's the matter?" asked a passing friend. "Sick?"

"Yes. I guess I'll have to go to Heaven," he replied, sticking the sample out aimlessly toward the inquirer.

"What do you mean?"

"Well, they say matches are made in Heaven, and I guess they're right. I'll swear they're not made anywhere around here."

PANICS AND PICNICS.

THE ONE BRINGS THE OTHER TO WALL STREET.

During Such Times as These Millionaire Speculators Double Their Millions at the Expense of Legitimate Industry—Primary Interests in the Way.

The Speculator's Day.

Setting aside the silver-mine owners, who want free coinage from a purely selfish purpose—to make a market for their product—there are many farmers, laborers, mechanics, clerks, etc., who honestly believe that silver is the poor man's, as gold is the rich man's, friend. They think they can get the best of Wall street's "gold bugs" by making plenty of silver money, thus breaking the monopoly of gold. They think that the hated capitalists are a unit for the use of gold, and nothing but gold, as money. Are they right? Should they not discriminate sharply between capitalists engaged in legitimate productive industry and Wall street speculators, trust conspirators, financial sharks, and usurers? The merchant, the manufacturer, the contractor, the mine operator, and the owners of transportation lines, as such, want a sound, reliable, and stable currency. It matters but little to them whether gold or silver or copper be the basis, providing the currency does not fluctuate in value and that the public has full confidence in its money system. These men are making their profits from the production of goods, and a cessation of business, because of a change from one kind of currency to another, or because Congress is tampering with the currency, hurts them. It not only makes it more difficult to contract ahead but it increases the uncertainties and risks of conducting business, and therefore makes it harder to obtain credit. For it must not be forgotten that a vast majority of such business firms both receive and give credit largely. When a panic occurs and business is at a standstill, with millions of men idle, and therefore consuming less than usual, these business men know that they must suffer a permanent loss. Therefore they are always ready to petition Congress, through their various exchanges—produce, cotton, oil, grocers, manufacturers, etc.—to give the country a sound currency.

But what of the rich speculator, stock wrecker, and usurer? He who sells and induces his friends to sell blocks of stock one week to "bear" the market so that he can buy all back the next week at his own terms, when he will become a "bull" until he has sold out at a handsome profit, when he turns "bear" again? He who has a large supply of money to hire out or to invest in gold or gold bonds, when it becomes evident that gold will soon be at a premium? These men are right at home in a tight money market, when they can obtain rates of interest anywhere from 10 to 50 per cent. Panics are picnics for them. If they can induce Congress, or get their Western silver friends to induce it, to begin monkeying with the currency system, they prepare to reap a rich harvest. It matters but little to them how much or how long business is deranged, how many men are thrown out of work, whether gold or silver become the money of the land. They are after shekels, and are not over-scrupulous as to how they get them. Usury or trust or swindling laws have no terrors for them. They do not invest in stocks or goods and trust to providence to increase the value of their investments. Oh, no! Nature is too slow and too uncertain. They make artificial prices high or low at will, and they get their slices no matter which way prices go—only they must be kept going. The more business is disturbed and the more prices fluctuate, the bigger will be their slices.

Before the late civil war our millionaires could be counted on one's fingers. By taking advantage of every turn in prices of goods or of gold, while the sturdy yeomanry were fighting his battles, the speculators who had $50,000 or $100,000, in 1860, emerged, in 1870, out of the blood and money crisis of ten years, worth millions. The foundations of many of the great fortunes of our 5,000 millionaires of to-day were laid while our nation was in greatest peril and distress. These men always play with loaded dice, but they prosper most when others prosper least. Great fortunes have been greatly increased during the last six months of fluctuating prices. No statistics are possible as to the growth of private fortunes which reap the greatest profits. Perhaps the best indication of the differentiation of wealth which is now occurring comes from the unusual profits now being made by loan and trust companies—corporations which loan money only at legal rates of interest and which, therefore, cannot take full advantage of the market. Up to July 20 twenty of these trust companies in New York had reported to the State Superintendent of Banking. With aggregate resources of $229,100,000, against $238,300,000 in 1892, they report profits of $3,709,157 for the same period last year. At whose expense do millionaire speculators double their millions if not at the expense of legitimate industry?—at the expense of farmers, laborers, manufacturers, merchants, etc. It is time for all honest producers to unite and demand a sound and stable currency.—Byron W. Holt.

Panicky Protection Trusts.

The New York Press is at the head of a conspiracy to make the people believe that they are afraid of themselves. The Press says the loss to the country through the decline in the value of stocks, since November, 1892, is over $500,000,000. It advises all Republican papers to proclaim that this is due to the fear of the country that wicked Democrats will keep their pledge and reduce the tariff to a revenue basis. There would be more sense in the claim that the decline was due to fear on the part of the great majority who voted to abolish protection, that the Democrats might not fulfill their pledge, but would be bribed by protection monopolists to break it. As protected trusts, like the sugar and cordage, have been the greatest losers, the Press may possibly be right. The conspirators who have obtained protection from McKinley in order to boom inflated trusts realize that illegal and unholy profits must soon cease. They see an impending doom for their business. Their bunco game must soon stop and the green goods which they have on hand is becoming worthless. It will be well for some of the industries that have been operated by trusts, paying big dividends on highly watered stock, if these trusts go all to pieces before the tariff is changed. Such industries can the more quickly organize on the new business basis—no protection, no watered stock, no trusts, and no exorbitant profits. Is this what the Press means by its cry of "stop thief?"

Puerile Politics.

The "report" of the Republican Club of this city, characterizing the financial disturbance as "the Democratic panic of 1893," and holding President Cleveland responsible for it, is too puerile to require an answer. When a ship is laboring in a stormy sea the passengers and crew do not stop to dispute about the responsibility of bringing her into danger. They devote themselves to trying to save the ship. This is what patriotic Americans are thinking about now. Only the little make-believe politicians who frequent clubs and try to talk and "resolve" themselves into prominence attempt to make party capital out of impending disaster. When the time comes to consider the responsibility the people will remember under whose administration the surplus was squandered, the reserve gold sent abroad, the Sherman act passed, the taxes increased, and the calamity organized.—New York World.

High-Handed Trusts.

It has long been the custom of tariff-protected trusts to sell their products lower to foreign than to home consumer. It is useless for the consumers to object, because the trusts are empowered by the McKinley bill to do exactly this sort of two-faced business. Not only does this bill put up no barriers against exports, but it encourages the exportation of manufactured goods at low prices by remitting the duty paid on the new materials when, and only when, goods are exported. The American consumer is bled unmercifully by this process and his interests are made subservient to the interests of organized capital. It is no wonder then that trusts, taking their cue from laws which disregard and even spurn the interests of the consumer, should treat him as having no rights which highly favored capitalists are bound to respect. So high-handed have these trusts become that some of them are wont to forget that their dictatorial power comes mainly from the tariff, and are showing, or attempting to show, favoritism to consumers under the same tariff but under different stars on our flag. Under the title, "Match Monopoly Humors," the Wooden and Willow-Ware Trade Review, thus describes one of the autocratic efforts of the Match Trust:

"In pursuance of its policy of controlling the sale of matches, the Diamond Match Company issues from time to time price lists to jobbers in good standing (i. e., those who live up to the letter and spirit of a code of rules which are held by the company to be as sacred as were the ancient laws), who are compelled to conduct their business on the basis of these prices, on the pain of being shut off from being able to procure matches. The jobber thus has no opportunity to fix the prices for which he sells his own goods, and he is thus placed at the mercy of any competition which may arise. Competition, it might be thought, could not possibly exist where such absolute dictation reigned, but the dictator had laid the foundation for a most peculiar kind of competition. For example, the Diamond Match Company issues from its Baltimore office two lists, giving the prices at which jobbers are permitted to sell matches. One of these lists bears this simple inscription: "Price list. The Diamond Match Company. Baltimore, Md." The other list has the following on its title page: "Price List. The Diamond Match Company. Special list for Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Florida. Jobbers selling goods in the above States will use this list. There are a number of differences in the prices as given in the two lists, the last mentioned being higher in every case where there is a difference. The result has been that the wooden and willow ware dealers of Baltimore are having a very interesting time in selling matches. In West Virginia, a foot away from the line dividing the State from Virginia, some matches can be sold at from 5 to 50 cents a gross less than they can a foot away from the border line in Virginia. Again, matches can be sold in Washington, D. C., at certain prices, while across the Potomac in Alexandria, Va., orthodox jobbers must sell them at advances ranging from 5 to 50 cents. Of course, the result is that Alexandria retail purveyors of matches make a pilgrimage to Washington, D. C. to meet the Baltimore jobber, contract there at the lower prices, and go home at once chuckling and indignant—chuckling over having outwitted the match dictator and indignant because they have had to journey to Washington. There are some stories afloat to the effect that there have been jobbers who were so philanthropic and heterodox as to break the (Match Company's) laws made and provided by saving the Alexandria merchants' trip to Washington through a stretch of imagination which permitted the jobbers' salesmen to believe that they were selling goods on Washington soil when they were actually on Alexandria territory. Another rumor is that one of these philanthropic and heterodox jobbers has been ruled out of the church, and can no longer secure orthodox matches. It is hardly necessary to offer any further evidence as to the ridiculousness of the Diamond Match Company attempting, with profit to itself, to maintain such price-lists."

It is not strange that the people can defeat the trust when there is no tariff to protect it, but it is strange that they should get so indignant at the trust for attempting to sustain two price-lists at home when it is quite the fashion to do so abroad. What the trusts want, and what they hope to obtain when McKinley is President, is more flexible tariff laws—laws that can be raised or lowered in the interests of needy manufacturers and that can, in cases of extreme necessity, be adjusted to different sections of this country.—Byron H. Helt.

Pecuniary Interests in the Way.

Whether protection does or does not increase national wealth, whether it does or does not benefit the laborer, are questions that from their nature must admit of decisive answers. That the controversy between protection and free trade, widely and energetically as it has been carried on, has as yet led to no accepted conclusion, cannot therefore be due to difficulties inherent in the subject. It may in part be accounted for by the fact that powerful pecuniary interests are concerned in the issue, for it is true, as Macauley said, that if large pecuniary interests were concerned in denying the attraction of gravitation, that most obvious of physical facts would have disputers. But that so many fair-minded men who have no special interests to serve are still at variance on this subject, can only, it seems to me, be fully explained on the assumption that the discussion has not been carried far enough to bring out that full truth which harmonizes all partial truths. — Henry George.

THE Pope's nephew, Count Camillo Pecci, is a thorn in his uncle's side. Having lost large sums at play and contracted heavy debts, the Pope paid all, but banished him from the Papal court. He now resides with his wife in Cuba. Pecci took the opportunity on the occasion of his uncle's jubilee to ask to come back to his old haunts, but his Holiness was obdurate.

AS THE language of the face is universal, so 'tis very comprehensive; 'tis the shorthand of the mind, and crowds a great deal in a little room.—Jeremy Collier.

THE Paris sewers are the largest and most complete in the world.

SEVEN LIVES ARE LOST.

Disastrous Result of the Floods in Pueblo Colorado.

The other night Pueblo, Colo., was overtaken by the greatest disaster in the history of the city, resulting in the loss of at least seven lives and the total destruction of an immense amount of property. The aggregate loss is not far from $250,000. When the people of Pueblo retired to their beds a gentle rain had been falling, and the Arkansas River flowed through the center of the city with the water but a few inches above the ordinary high water mark, but at 11 o'clock all were awakened by the discordant screeching of the great fire-alarm whistle and the continuous tooting of other whistles in all parts of the city. The Arkansas river flowed bank full. The water broke over the levee in two places, and the entire lower portion of the city was threatened with a flood. The city hall was flooded, and all the basements in that block were filled. A break west of the city resulted in flooding that portion of the city west of the Union Depot and Victoria avenue. The loss will be nearly $100,000. The water works were completely shut down by the flood, and in the midst of the excitement a fire broke out in a large saloon, but was put out with chemicals. Hundreds of poor people living in the flats have fled from their homes to higher ground.

The rise was so unexpected and so rapid that it was impossible for the gallant rescuers to do more than to save life, no opportunity being given to attempt to remove personal belongings. The carcasses of all kinds of domestic animals float by dozens in the water. It is known that an immigrant with his wife and five children were camped in a tent on the Fountain bottoms, and that they were drowned by the rushing wall of water which tore down the bed of the brook, carrying everything before it. The corpses of two men were seen floating down the Arkansas, but the river was so turbulent that it was impossible to stop them. A number of persons are reported missing by their relatives and friends, and it is altogether likely that when the waters subside sufficiently to permit a careful search the bodies of many will be discovered in the ruins of their homes.

ROOF WALK TO BE REOPENED.

Plans Perfected to Make the Top of the Manufactures Building Safe.

The promenade on the roof of the Manufactures Building at the World's Fair is soon to be thrown open to the public again. It has been determined that in putting in the fire escapes and other protections recommended by the City Council the promenade has been made safe. The plan adopted provides for broad and easy stairways at each corner of the building leading from the promenade over the slope of the roof to the second gallery inside. From here exit to the ground is easy from a large number of stairways and by fire escapes outside. It is believed this will remove all the objections to admitting the public to the roof promenade. Another attraction in the manufactures building which will soon be ready is the Yerkes telescope, which is being erected in the center aisle near the north end. It is expected this will be in position within a week.

At Chicago Royal Leads All.

As the result of my tests, I find the ROYAL BAKING POWDER superior to all the others in every respect. It is entirely free from all adulteration and unwholesome impurity, and in baking it gives off a greater volume of leavening gas than any other powder. It is therefore not only the purest, but also the strongest powder with which I am acquainted.

Sustaining the Unities.

"I notice that you are not so attentive to Miss Caramel as formerly," said an Austin youth to his companion; "have the chilly autumnal winds congealed your heart?"

"O, no," replied the companion, that's not it; my heart is warm enough. You see Miss Caramel is a good summer girl."

"A good summer girl!"

"Yes, she'll do through the hot weather, when it only costs 30 cents for ice-cream for two; but her father is poor, you know. Now, that the oyster season has arrived, and it costs from a dollar to a dollar and six bits for Berwick Bay oysters, why, it is much more comforting to feed Miss Stonaway. Her father's worth $300,000, and a man feels as though he wasn't exactly throwing away his salary when he sets up the feed."—Texas Siftings.

A Trifling Subject.

A young woman of this city, whose quick wit is responsible for the loss of a number of friends, has just seen another retire from the list.

The young man was in a philosophical mood and remarked:

"Self-study is a bad thing."

"I shouldn't be surprised," she responded flippantly.

"Now, I am sure that if I were to devote myself to thinking about myself I should become very narrow-minded."

"Oh, yes; you'd probably have to in order to grasp the subject."

And for the time he really felt as small as she had pictured him.—Washington Star.

Parisian Fools.

The superchic young men in Paris (according to an imaginative correspondent,) not content with mere boot lasts, have plaster casts made of their legs from the waist down, with the object of keeping both their trousers, their knee-breeches, and even their underwear in proper shape. One youth, with more money than brains, has an entire room of his residence devoted to the reception of some sixty pairs of plaster-of-Paris counterparts of his legs, and nothing is more peculiar than the spectacle presented by this army of fully clothed limbs standing about without any trunk and head.

Is This So?

There is a large factory in a small town near Chicago, employing about 100 workers, which is given over to the manufacture of articles from waste animal blood. At certain seasons of the year this unique factory uses quite 10,000 gallons of fresh blood per day. It is first converted into thin sheets by evaporation and certain chemical processes, and afterwards worked up into a variety of articles, such as combs, buttons, ear-rings, belt-clasps, bracelets, etc. Tons of these articles are sent to all parts of the world every year.

Use of Tobacco by Southern Women.

One hears much of snuff dipping among Southern women, but the practice is falling into desirable desuetude. The usual mode is to chew the end of a stick into a brush, and with that to rub powdered tobacco on the teeth. But while "dipping" is disappearing, smoking is a general practice among women of all ages and colors, and it rather shocks the Northern traveler in the "moonshine" country to see a rosy mountain Venus going about her housework with a corncob pipe stuck between her teeth.

What to Expect.

The facetious man had built himself a nice new house with a stone veranda and steps up in the front and took a friend to look at it.

"Very nice; very nice, indeed," said the friend critically, "but it has such a set look. Lacks expression, you know."

"Of course," replied the owner, "but what else could you expect from a house with such a stony stair?" And he sat down on the steps and laughed.

Scriptural.

"Why is it that when a woman loses her husband she becomes so attractive to men?"

"It is the old, old story of the widow's might."—Judge.

Perhaps an Echo.

About the time of the American revolution the French commander, De La Motte-Piquet, met, as he left Quiberon Bay, two American vessels which saluted him. He replied, according to ministerial instructions, with nine salutes of cannon, an honor to which the ships of the American Republic were entitled. The English Embassador immediately asked an explanation of the French Minister, De Vergennes. De Vergennes replied, good-naturedly and as if he had hardly given the matter a thought: "Perhaps it was the echo of the salute that you gave to a Corsican war-ship when the King, my master, regarded Corsica as a rebel, as your ruler very well knew."

Appropriate.

At a dinner given to Turner, the painter, who was an inveterate cockney, the talk turned upon one of his drawings of South Coast scenery—a view of a distant river, with a greyhound at full speed after a hare in the foreground. A guest was examining this plate with admiration, when Turner called out: "Ah! I see you want to know why I have introduced that 'are. It is a bit of sentiment, sir; for that's the spot where 'Arold 'Arefoot fell, and you see I 'ave made an 'ound a-chasing an 'are!"

Circumstantial Evidence.

Tommy was getting well of the measles, and his mother was properly careful lest he should be allowed to expose himself.

"Is Tommy still out in that cold garden, Bridget?" she asked toward nightfall.

"No, mum; he's come in."

"Where is he?"

"Sure an' I haven't seen him, mum; but I know he's come in, 'cause the cat's got on top of the tea cupboard."—Exchange.

The Fecund Fly.

A fly will lay four times during the summer, about eighty eggs each time, and careful calculations have demonstrated that the descendants of a single insect may from June 1 to the end of September exceed 2,000,000. Were it not for bats, insect-eating birds, and the innumerable microscopic parasites with which the fly is particularly afflicted there would be no worse pest in the world than the fly.

Lawyers Willing to Take Chances.

Johanna Eilers, who died in Brooklyn two or three months ago, left a will in which she "called down the curse of God" upon any lawyer who would contest it. The contest is now going on. DR. KILMER'S SWAMP-ROOT

CURED ME.

Dr. Kilmer & Co., Binghamton, N. Y.

Gentlemen:—"I desire to tell you just how I was, so that the public may know of your wonderful Swamp-Root. Two years ago last October I had spells of vomiting; I could not keep anything in my stomach; the Doctor said I had consumption of the stomach and bowels; continued to run-down in weight; I was reduced to 60 lbs. I would vomit blood, and at one time as much as three pints; we had two of the best Physicians and they said my case was hopeless. "Oh, my sufferings were terrible." A neighbor told us of your Swamp-Root, and my husband got a bottle; I took it to please him. I used six bottles of Swamp-Root and I am now nearly as well as ever. I weigh 108 lbs., do my own work and take care of my baby. Every one says, I was raised from the dead, and many will not believe that I am still living until they come and see me, and then they can't believe their own eyes, I am looking so well." Very gratefully,

Died, at his residence in Stafford township DeKalb county, July 31, 1893, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, after an illness of more than twenty years, John S. Greenwald.

The deceased was born in Burks Co., Pa., June 9, 1835, where he grew to manhood and at the age of 21 years was united in marriage to Mary Miller. To them were born nine children, two daughters, five sons and his wife surviving. He came to DeKalb county in 1865 and purchased the Wanamaker farm where he has since resided. In about the year 1870, he became afflicted with rheumatism which increased in severity, until he was compelled to take to his bed and for more than fifteen years was unable to arise from it, and for fully ten years was as completely helpless as an infant of a few days, unable to raise a hand or foot. Yet mid all this terrible affliction his mental powers were unaffected. Although unable to look after the smallest detail of of his large farm, he had the most perfect knowledge of every field and building and while lying on his back in the house, so wisely directed his sons about the farm work, as to actually prosper, purchase more land, improve and enlarge his buildings and other farm improvements Unable to move a finger, he had his bed so arranged that he could read the papers and was as well posted politically and many who devoted their time to public affairs. Amid all these adverse conditions he was cheerful, contented and spoke of himself as others do, who enjoy all the blessings of life. His body and limbs remained in one position so long that the joints became as solid as if they never had existed and were wholly immovable. His funeral took place from his residence Aug 2. Rev. Mr Tedro of the U. B. church officiating. The services were held in Wartenbe's grove and his remains were laid to rest in the cemetery thereby.

The Money Lender.

Some of our exchanges, particularly some of the so-called third party ones, are passing around an article with the above headlines. The body of the article is nothing but a list of questions supposed to be forcibly put to somebody. It contains a pretty full list of all the evils the business world has ever seen, and some it never dreamed of. In each case the question is, "Who is at the bottom of this evil?" "Who is to blame for" another, and so on down a column of such questions. And in each case, the answer is, "The Money Lender." Our experience with this abused class is not very extensive, but experience is not needed to show any thinking man the utter folly of a tirade like this. Without doubt, money lenders have now and then oppressed those to whom they had lent money. But no more frequently than has been done by men in other lines of business. And who shall say, there are not instances where the borrower needed severe treatment. Because a man is a borrower, is no sign he is a saint or a statesman, or even a good neighbor. It is no guaranty even, that he is honest. And when he develops any of these undesirable qualities, he must be dealt with in the same way others are dealt with—even as we would deal with the wicked money lender. We deplore the perversion of taste or error of judgment that tries to set one class of men against another. What possible good can come of it? Will it benefit the borrower, whose needs have compelled him to seek the use of another man's money? Will it benefit the lender, if he be a good man, or reform him if bad? Hardly. The most it can do is to set by the ears, people that otherwise could work together in harmony. Business would come to a standstill, if it were not for borrowing, and borrowing would be impossible, without "money lenders." The cry against the money lenders savors too much of the anarchist practice of setting the poor against the wealthy and getting up a senseless strife between those who need work by which to support themselves, and those with whom alone it is possible to get this employment and its needed pay. It would be just as sensible to raise a cry against the borrower as against the lender and try to make him shoulder the blame for all the evils in our financial affairs. In doing this we might try to make a saint of the money lender, and a sinner of the borrower. But what good would result? As in the actual case, the needy man would go on as before, borrowing money when he needed it and could not get it in any other way, and the man who had money to spare would keep on lending it. The world, in either case, goes right on as before. The only one made happy is the anarchist or the editor who needs something exciting to fill up his "insides."

The Real Value of Local Paper.

Here is what ex Governor Francis, of Missouri says in the times:

"Each year the local paper gives from $500 to $5,000 in free lines to a community in which it is located. No other agency can or will do this. The editor in proportion to his means, does more for his own town than ten men, and in all fairness with men he ought to be supported, not because you like him or admire his writings, but because the local paper is the best investment a community can make. It may not be brilliantly edited or crowded with thoughts, but financially it is of more benefit to a community than a preacher or a teacher Understand me, I do not mean morally or intellectually, but financially, and yet on the moral question you will find that most of the local papers are on the right side. To-day the editor of the home paper does more for the least money on earth.

It Should be in Every House.

J. B Wilson, 371 Clay St., Sharpsburg, Pa., says he will not be without Dr. King's New Discovery for consumption, coughs and colds, that it cured his wife who was threatened with pneumonia after an attack of "LaGrippe," when various other remedies and several physicians had done her no good. Robert Barber, of Cooksport, Pa., claims Dr. King's New Discovery has done him more good than anything he ever used for lung trouble. Nothing like it. AUBURN AND VICINITY.

Some Reminiscences of its Early Days and Pioneer Citizens.

1871—Continued.

Under the auspicious dawning of a bright and promising future for Auburn, the place enjoyed an actual as well as prospective prosperity and strangers attracted by favorable report, found a live town in which not a few decided to cast their lot.

There were in the month of April, no less than twenty-three buildings in course of construction and this did not include any of the new business houses for which the material was already upon the ground.

Some of those commencing or completing residences and other improvements were Charles Beugnot, J. Showalter, E. Kuhlman, C. S. Shrader, John Lawrence, H. E. Altenburg, William Baughn, Theron Clark, Samuel T. Galloway, Samuel Swihart, Simeon U. Tarney, Charles F. Floyd, James L. Penny, Joseph Abright and Lewis Bowers.

Carpenters estimated from the number of bids solicited, that at least seventy-five new residences would be erected during the year. There was not a vacant house in Auburn and the demand was imperative for dwellings to own or to rent by persons desirous of moving in.

In January, the question of organizing a building and loan association to enable those limited in means to acquire homes and incidentally to build up the town, began to be agitated. The scheme was favorably regarded and by the close of February, measures were so well advanced that success was assured. Two months later, the requisite amount of of stock had been subscribed; organization had been effected and articles of the "Auburn Building and Saving Association" had been filed with the secretary of state.

The charter fixed the capital stock at $100,000 divided into 500 shares of $200 each. The directors for the first year were Wm. McIntyre, John L. Davis, Thomas C. Mays, Joseph Albright, Jacob B. Casebeer, Daniel Z. Hoffman, Christopher S. Hare, Henry C. Peterson and Albert Robbins. J. B. Casebeer was elected president, T. C. Mays secretary and W. McIntyre, treasurer. The meetings at which a fund accumulated by payment of monthly installments, was offered at auction, were scenes of much enthusiasm as the accrued funds were struck off to the shareholder who bid the greatest premium. Each loan was secured by mortgage on real estate and interest was paid monthly.

During the eight years' term of existence of this association, it promoted habits of economy, afforded means of profitable investment and greatly enhanced the value of property purchased and built upon. By this means, good homes were acquired by many who otherwise would never have owned them and when it had answered the design of its creation in its benefit to families and the public, its existence quietly closed.

To this time no movement towards enlarging boundaries eastward promised success but now, besides the expansion to the northwest, town limits were extended southward by an addition laid out by George Ensley by whom successive additions have been platted to the number of four. Upon these tracts, some of Auburn's most valuable and extensive manufactories have been located, to grow from experimental and crude industries into permanent and systematic factories, shops and mills, giving profitable investment to capital and steady employment to many men.

Attention was directed in March to the operations of Charles Beugnot & Co., who were establishing a large stave factory upon grounds acquired adjacent to the railroad in the northwest part of the town. This sterling and reliable firm had pushed the work of erecting buildings, put in machinery and advertised for material for manufacture of staves and headings on a large scale. By the middle of May, the firm was ready for work. The commencement was most promising and soon the daily product of the factory amounted to 25,000 staves alone. From that time for a period of fifteen years, this manufactory carried on a heavy business, bringing thousands of dollars into the pockets of farmers, giving steady employment whose payment had been the support of a number of families and materially and opportunely aiding in the movement to build up the place.

To supply requisite amount of material, a brisk demand was created for stave bolts; and owners of woodlands hitherto unremunerative, were gratified and encouraged to find a cash market for their abundant timber. The factory was never forced to suspend for lack of raw product and the extent of forest available is shown by its immense product consequent upon continuous operation of the plant so many years.

The factory had under the same management a saw mill with a capacity for ten to twelve hundred feet of lumber per day, besides planing, lath and shingle mills; it employed twenty-five hands and in its entirety, constituted a most valuable adjunct to Auburn's business interests.

Charles Beugnot thoroughly identified himself with the town; together with the Schaab brothers, opened up a fine double store for sale of ready made clothing, goods and groceries; and the venture in a degree connected with the factory business, proved satisfactory. In time, one of the Schaab brothers sold to the firm and in 1885, the other went into business on his own account and has continued to date.

In 1885, Mr. Beugnot took David Ober into partnership in conduct of the stave factory and for a time the firm of Ober & Beugnot carried on the manufactory.

In 1872, Mr. Beugnot was a popular and promising man; he erected a fine dwelling in the north part of town, was elected a town trustee and later town treasurer, in which capacity he served satisfactorily, but aspiring to fill the lucrative office of town treasurer, secured a nomination on the republican ticket to be overwhelmingly defeated at the polls by his astute political antagonist, LaFayette J. Miller, then serving his first term in the office. He soon after disposed of his property in Auburn, sold his interest in the factory to Mr. Ober and went south, since which little is known of him. It must in justice be admitted that his coming to Auburn when he did and starting his factory was a service great and lasting, realized and promptly requited by local honors and worthy of remembrance.

AROUND THE WORLD.

INTELLIGENCE FROM ALL PARTS OF THE GLOBE.

Agitation Among Catholics—Annexation Thought to Be the Final Destiny of the Sandwich Islands—Gasoline Explosion—Cashier Goes Wrong.

CATHOLICS AGITATED

At the Reported Elevation of Rademacher as Archbishop.

Evansville (Ind.) special: There is considerable agitation among Catholics of the diocese of Vincennes and especially the Evansville deanery on account of the selection of Bishop Rademacher, of Nashville, Tenn., to succeed the late Rt. Rev. Bishop Dwenger of Fort Wayne, Ind. Bishop Rademacher has been made Archbishop of Indiana, which includes parts of Iowa and Illinois. It had been known for some time among the churchmen that this arch diocese would be created. It was expected that Bishop Chatard of the Vincennes diocese, would be recognized, but it seems he has been overlooked. Of course Bishop Rademacher must have a successor at Nashville, and it is the general belief that the Very Reverend Father E. F. McBarron, pastor of the Church of the Assumption, in this city and Dean, of the Evansville diocese, will be honored with the place. The priests select the names of persons whom they desire to be candidates and the list is sent to the Pope at Rome for a decision. While Father McBarron is preserving a dignified silence in the matter, it is stated on what is considered reliable authority that he has received intimation from the Tennesseeans that he is the most favored one on the list as Bishop Rademacher's successor. Father McBarron is a very capable churchman, and would certainly please the Southerners. It is stated that in the event of his appointment, the Rev. Father Fitzpatrick, pastor of the Sacred Heart, in this city, will become his vicar general, and the Rev. Father P. H. Rowan, assistant pastor of Assumption, this city, his chancellor.

Dreadful Casualty in a Mill at Fostoria.

The boilers of the Cadwalder flouring mill, located in the heart of Fostoria, Ohio, exploded completely wrecking the mill. Not a brick was left standing in the engine room. Glancy Davis, secretary of the milling company, and Fred C. Myers, an expert accountant, were in the office, which is located just over the engine room, and both were killed. They were blown about twenty-five feet, Davis being instantly killed and badly mangled. Myers was partially conscious when picked up, but was so horribly mangled as to be unrecognizable. An inquiry made as to who the unfortuate man was brought the reply from him, "I am Fred Myers." He had a terrible hole in his head, from which the brain could be plainly seen. He lingered a few hours, when death relieved him.

Sandwich Islands.

Victoria (B. C.) special: John A. Scott, a resident of the Sandwhich Islands for fourteen years, passed through here recently, on his way to Almonto, Ont. Mr. Scott is the manager of a sugar plantation. He is of the opinion that annexation is the final destiny of the islands, although a vote of the people at present would probably show a large majority opposed to such a union. The natives, who are in the majority, would vote for the old monarch, while the whites would be practically unanimous for a change of government. He thinks the provisional government would be wise to defer plebiscite for a few years to give the natives time to acquire confidence in republican institutions.

Crop Report.

Indiana—Corn crop will be short everywhere and an entire failure in many sections; potatoes in bad condition; pastures ruined: farmers feeding cattle.

Ohio—Corn, potatoes, tobacco, and pastures suffering from drought.

Michigan—Pastures, meadows, and clover considerably damaged. Corn and potatoes in fair condition. Grasshoppers injuring vegetation.

Gasoline Explosion.

A gasoline stove exploded at William F. Field's residence at Decatur, Ill., and set fire to the clothing of Mrs. Henry M. Gossett, who ran screaming into a lot of dry grass, where she fell and was burned to death. Her sister, Mrs. Catherine, had her hands, face, and arms shockingly burned, and Mrs. William Field was also seriously injured.

Farmer Killed by Tramps.

William Ploughfield, a farmer living near Birdsboro, Pa., was stabbed to death, and his brother John was wounded by two tramps whom they discovered stealing potatoes and were trying to drive from the potato patch. The murderers escaped.

He Took $41,000.

The banking house of C. M. Wright & Co., of Altamont, Ill., suspended. The cashier, Levi Butler, is missing. He left a letter saying that he took $41,000. It is said the depositors will be paid in full.

Convict Camp Attacked.

A special from Knoxville, Tenn., says that there has been another attack by miners on the convict camp at Cole Creek. One soldier was killed.

Treacherous Dogs.

San Francisco special: Advices by an Australian steamer state that a Queensland "labor" vessel, while recruiting off the coast of Malayta, Solomon Islands, was attacked and seized by the natives. The white crew was killed and the vessel first looted and then set fire to and burned to the water's edge. The first intimation of the affair was brought to Noumea by the "labor" vessel, Lady Staubyn, which had fallen into company with another vessel that had natives on board who were aware of the circumstances. The plan adopted by the chief at Malayta was to decoy the vessel to a certain place on the coast on promise of supplying a number of recruits This was done after he had ostensibly shown his bona fides by putting on board a number of natives. On the arrival of the vessel at the rendezvous she was surrounded by armed canoes and her crew quickly dispatched by the combined forces of natives afloat and those already taken aboard.

SUFFERED DEATH.

Van Loon, the Columbus Grove Murderer, Executed.

Columbus special: Thursday was the last day on earth for Frank Van Loon, the murderer, who has made such a fight for life. Early in the morning David Van Loon, the condemned man's father, Mrs. Van Loon, the prisoner's wife, and their attorney, E. L. Dewitt, were at the Governor's office. Other visits were made during the forenoon, but Gov. McKinley kindly but firmly refused to interfere with the [illegible]cution of the law's sentence. [illegible] fact was made known to Van Loon [illegible] his cell by his brother-in-law, Oyler, and the prisoner at once became roaring wild and totally collapsed. He afterwards became quieter and engaged with Chaplin Dudley in prayer. He bade his wife and relatives farewell in a very cold and indifferent way. He was hanged in the prison at night. During the afternoon a telegram was received that Van Loon's child was dying at Galena, Ohio. It had been ill for some time.

The crime for which Van Loon suffered death was committed at Columbus Grove, Ohio, August 8, 1891. That day he entered the Exchange Bank there, and, flourishing two revolvers, demanded the bank's money of Cashier Maple. Before that gentleman could do anything, Van Loon fired at him three times, two shots taking effect in Maple's arm and side. At this moment William Vandermark, an old farmer, entered the room. Van Loon started to leave, and meeting the old man placed a revolver against him, fired into his abdomen and fled. Vandermark died the next day. The bank was then deserted and the bandit helped himself to the cash, taking about $1,200. He made good his escape as the people of the town were terrorized.

William Roberts was arrested for the crime and positively identified by witnesses, but afterward released and Van Loon arrested. The latter, who had always been broke, displayed large sums of money to some relatives who disliked him. After a hard fought trial Van Loon was convicted. The case was contested in the circuit and supreme courts, the sentence of death being confirmed in each.

DUN'S REVIEW.

A More Healthy Tone Follows the Demoralization of the Speculative Market.

R. G. Dun & Co.'s weekly review of trade: Demoralization in the speculative market has been followed by a more healthy tone. In money markets there has come a singular sense of relief, notwithstanding an actual increase in present embarrassments almost amounting to a paralysis of exchange between the chief commercial cities, and of many industrial works, because even 2 per cent. premium for currency fails to secure what is needed for the payment of wages. Hopes are nevertheless fixed on ships which will bring over $11,000,000 gold across the sea, and on the extra session of Congress. Stocks at the lowest point averaged a little more than $41 a share, but it is yet a long way down to the prices of 1877, averaging at the lowest $41 a share, and the contrast between the condition and earnings of the railroads now and then is greater than the difference in price. In anxious efforts to fortify themselves, the banks throughout the country have locked up a large amount of currency, and depositors who have drawn their accounts are also keeping out of use many millions. As the entire circulation of bills of less than $5 each is but $71,000,000, the withdrawal or the mere withholding of accustomed deposits by a considerable proportion of them would put out of market much of small notes. The closing of shops and works for lack of orders is the overshadowing fact.

OLD PEOPLE ATTACKED.

Three Masked Men Try to Extort Money From Them.

The other night three masked men entered the residence of A. Beam, residing near Somerset, Pa., a retired farmer, 97 years of age, and finding Mr. and Mrs. Beam alone demanded their money. Mrs. Beam handed them a pocketbook containing less than a dollar. The robbers turned furiously upon the old couple and beat them in a horrible manner. A piece of firewood was forced down Mr. Beam's throat in an effort to extort from him the hiding place of his supposed wealth. The old gentleman lost consciousness, and the robbers, thinking they had killed him, knocked Mrs. Beam senseless with a club, and fled. Mrs. Beam finally recovered and rang the dinner bell to arouse the neighbors, several of whom responded. Dr. Coude says it is doubtful whether Mr. Beam will recover. No trace of the robbers has been found. Mrs. Beam is unable to give a description of the men.

Fish Killer.

Columbus (Ohio) special: Dr. Probst, Secretary of the State Board of Health, returned from his inspection of the Sandusky River, and the effect of the waste from the strawboard works at Tiffin on the water. With the Fremont Board the doctor drove from that city to Tiffin, a distance of about eighteen miles, following the river. The greatest trouble appears to be at Fort Seneca, about midway between the two cities. The works are located just below Tiffin, and for three or four miles the water in the river is discolored, and dead fish by the score can be found in the water, showing that the chemicals contained in the refuse are poisonous. Dr. Probst arranged with the Township Trustees to remove the fish and keep the stream clear of pollution from this source, and as the works are to shut down for a time the difficulty will be obviated temporarily.

Protection for Presbyterian Missionaries.

The Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions in New York, has received a personal letter from the Hon. Walter Q. Gresham, Secretary of State, in which he pledged the Government to do all that was possible to compel the Porte to punish the perpetrators of the latest outrage upon an American missionary in Turkey. The communication referred to the attack which was made upon Miss Annie Melton, a missionary of the board in a village in the Koordis Mountains. At a meeting of the board a resolution was adopted expressing gratification at the prompt and vigorous action on the part of the Secretary of State.

Prize Fight Proves Fatal.

The "Sailor Kid," whose correct name is differently given as Booby Taylor, and Lon Turner, who fought a draw other the night in a pugilistic encounter at the Rambler's club rooms, River Front Park, Denver, is dead. By order of the district attorney, state warrants were promptly sworn out for all those concerned in the mill. "Kid," or William Robinson, colored was the "Sailor Kid's" opponent and the latter was terribly beaten up. Bat Masterson, who refereed the fight, has fled. The kid never regained consciousness after leaving the ring. All concerned in the affair are to be taken into custody as fast as deputies can find them.

Shot His Sweetheart.

At Jackson, Mich., Charles McCormick shot and fatally wounded Miss Jeanette Neil. The tragedy occurred at the home of Miss Neil's sister, Mrs. John Kelly. McCormick had been to see the young lady and had asked her to marry him. She refused. He returned to the house, pulled a revolver from his pocket, fired at Mrs. Kelly but missed her, and then shot Miss Neil under the right eye. He then shot himself through the head. Neither he nor Miss Neil will live, the doctors say.

Removed a Rail.

An attempt was made to wreck the south-bound passenger train on the Wabash Railroad near Moberly, Mo., the other night. Shortly after midnight the son of the station agent overheard two men talking about the expected wreck. He summoned help and an examination of the track showed that a rail had been removed near a bridge. The train was flagged and the track repaired. The company's detectives are at work and the capture of the miscreants is assured.

Deadly Explosion.

Berlin special: A disastrous explosion occurred on board the German armor-clad steamer, Baden, at Keil. Lieutenants Oelsner and Zembsch and seven seamen were killed and seventeen persons were wounded. It appears that some of the men had just removed from the magazine a grenade measuring twenty-six centimetres in diameter. Through some cause not yet explained the grenade exploded, killing or wounding nearly every person in the immediate vicinity.

Passenger Train Wrecked.

Train No. 19, known as the Atlantic express, on the Lake Shore Railroad, west bound, jumped the track at Lindsay, Ohio, twenty-two miles east of Toledo. A freight train was standing on the siding and the passenger train crashed into it. It is supposed that the switch was not tightly closed, which caused the train to leave the rails. It was heavily loaded with passengers, one of whom was killed outright and seven other more or less seriously injured.

Indiana at the Fair.

Mr Henry G. Thayer of Plymouth, Ind., has been appointed by Governor Matthews to succeed Clem Studebaker on the Indiana World's Fair Commission. Mr. Thayer is a banker at Plymouth, and well known as a Republican, having been a candidate for Congress from that district. The Governor has issued a proclamation fixing August 22 as "Indiana Day" at the fair. The program is yet to be arranged by the executive committee.

Precautions at Naples.

Washington special: Assistant Surgeon Young, at Naples, cables the Marine Hospital Service that cholera is spreading in the suburbs of Naples and that the Italian Government has consented to the adoption of measures for complete isolation for five days of emigrants on board vessels before sailing for the United States, which includes the ordering off of all bum-boats and other modes of communicating infection from the shore.

Large Factories Resume Operation.

The American sheet mill, one of the largest iron industries at Phillipsburg, N. J., after being closed down nearly two months, has resumed operations with enough orders to keep the mill going steadily with its day force.

Work is partially resumed at Jones & Laughlin's American Iron Works at Pittsburgh. Seven mills in the finishing departments, the billet mill and the steel plant are in operation. About 500 men are at work.

Blew His Head Off

Ephraim Aikman, an old resident of Kokoma, Ind., locked himself in an out-house after a quarrel with his family, and blew his head off with a shot-gun. He was 64 years old.

From Base Ball to Murder.

Larry McKean, one of the most famous pitchers in the National League six years ago, split open the head of J. O. Deeder, a railroad man, in a bar room brawl at Indianapolis.

Epileptic Killed.

Frank Thompson of Westville, Ohio, an epileptic, while walking on the Pan-Handle track, was seized with a fit and while in that condition was run over and killed.

Cholera in Russia.

The government is closing eleven schools in the south of Russia on account of cholera. Twenty doctors have gone to the Caucasus, fourteen to Kief and ten to Pondolia.

A Balcony Fell.

By the collapse of a balcony at the boat house of the Chelsea Yacht Club, Boston, four persons were killed and a score or more injured.

MESSAGE TO CONGRESS

THE PRESIDENT CONSIDERS FINANCE ONLY.

He Favors the Immediate and Unconditional Repeal of the Sherman Law, and Holds It Principally Responsible for the Present Alarming Business Situation.

Text of the Document.

President Cleveland's message to the LIIId Congress, assembled in extraordinary session, is comparatively brief. The message is special rather than general in its character, and is limited to the necessities of the financial situation. Mr. Cleveland insists upon the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law, and he attributes to it principally the ills with which the country is now threatened. The document in full reads as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

The existence of an alarming and extraordinary business situation, involving the welfare and prosperity of all our people, has constrained me to call together in extra session the people's representatives in Congress, to the end that, through a wise and patriotic exercise of the legislative duty with which they solely are charged, present evils may be mitigated and dangers threatening the future may be averted.

Our unfortunate financial plight is not the result of untoward events nor of conditions related to our natural resources; nor is it traceable to any of the afflictions which frequently check national growth and prosperity. With plenteous crops, with abundant promise of remunerative production and manufacture, with unusual invitation to safe investment and with satisfactory assurance to business enterprise, suddenly financial distrust and fear have sprung up on every side. Numerous moneyed institutions have suspended because abundant assets were not immediately available to meet the demands of frightened depositors: surviving corporations and individuals are too content to keep in hand the money they are usually anxious to loan, and those engaged in legitimate business are surprised to find that the securities they offer for loans, though heretofore satisfactory, are no longer accepted. Values supposed to be fixed are fast becoming conjectural, and loss and failure have invaded every branch of business.

The Silver Purchase Law.

I believe these things are principally chargeable to Congressional legislation touching the purchase and coinage of silver by the general government. This legislation is embodied in a statute passed on the 14th day of July, 1890, which was the culmination of much agitation on the subject involved, and which may be considered a truce, after the long struggle, between the advocates of free silver coinage and those intending to be more conservative. Undoubtedly the monthly purchases by the Government of 4,500,000 ounces of silver, forced under that statute, were regarded by those interested in silver production as a certain guaranty of its increase in price. The result, however, has been entirely different, for immediately following a spasmodic and slight rise the price of silver began to fall after the passage of the act, and has since reached the lowest point ever known. This disappointing result has led to renewed and persistent effort in the direction of free coinage.

Meanwhile, not only are the evil effects of the operation of the present law constantly accumulating, but the result to which its execution must inevitably lead is becoming palpable to all who give the least heed to financial subjects. This law provides that in payment for the 4,500,000 ounces of silver bullion which the Secretary of the Treasury is commanded to purchase monthly there shall be issued Treasury notes redeemable on demand in gold or silver coin, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and that said notes may be reissued. It is, however, declared in the act to be "the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals upon a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio or such ratio as may be provided by law." This declaration so controls the action of the Secretary of the Treasury as to prevent his exercising the discretion nominally vested in him, if by such action the parity between gold and silver may be disturbed. Manifestly a refusal by the Secretary to pay these Treasury notes in gold, if demanded, would necessarily result in their discredit and depreciation as obligations payable only in silver, and would destroy the parity between the two metals by establishing a discrimination in favor of gold.

Up to the 15th day of July, 1893, these notes had been issued in payment of silver bullion, purchased to the amount of more than $147,000,000. While all but a very small quantity of this bullion remains uncoined and without usefulness in the Treasury, many of the notes given in its purchase have been paid in gold. This is illustrated by the statement that between the first day of May, 1892, and the fifteenth day of July, 1893, the notes of this kind issued in payment for silver bullion amounted to a little more than fifty-four millions of dollars, and that during the same period about forty-nine millions of dollars were paid by the Treasury in gold for the redemption of such notes.

Drain Upon the Gold Reserve.

The policy necessarily adopted of paying these notes in gold has not spared the gold reserve of $100,000,000 long ago set aside by the Government for the redemption of other notes, for this fund has already been subjected to the payment of new obligations amounting to about $150,000,000 on account of silver purchases, and has, as a consequence, for the first time since its creation, been encroached upon.

We have thus made the depletion of our gold easy, and have tempted other and more appreciative nations to add it to their stock. That the opportunity we have offered has not been neglected is shown by the large amounts of gold which have been recently drawn from our Treasury and exported to increase the financial strength of foreign nations. The excess of exports of gold over its imports for the year ending June 30, 1893, amounted to more than eighty-seven and a half millions of dollars. Between the first day of July, 1890, and the fifteenth day of July, 1893, the gold coin and bullion in our Treasury decreased more than one hundred and thirty-two millions of dollars, while during the same period the silver coin and bullion in the Treasury increased more than one hundred and forty-seven millions of dollars. Unless Government bonds are to be constantly issued and sold to replenish our exhausted gold, only to be again exhausted, it is apparent that the operation of the Silver Purchase law, now in force, leads in the direction of the entire substitution of silver for the gold in the Government Treasury, and that this must be followed by the payment of all Government obligations in depreciated silver.

At this stage gold and silver must part company, and the Government must fail in its established policy to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other. Given over to the exclusive use of a currency greatly depreciated according to the standard of the commercial world, we could no longer claim a place among the nations of the first class, nor could our Government claim a performance of its obligations, so far as such an obligation has been imposed upon it, to provide for the use of the people the best and safest money. If, as many of its friends claim, silver ought to occupy a larger place in our currency and the currency of the world through general international co-operation and agreement, it is obvious that the United States will not be in a position to gain a hearing in favor of such an arrangement so long as we are willing to continue our attempt to accomplish the result single-handed.

Resulted in a Lack of Confidence.

The knowledge in business circles among our own people that our Government can not make its fiat equivalent to intrinsic value, nor keep inferior money on a parity with superior money by its own independent efforts, has resulted in such a lack of confidence at home in the stability of currency values that capital refuses its aid to new enterprises while millions are actually withdrawn from the channels of trade and commerce to become idle and unproductive in the hands of timid owners. Foreign investors, equally alert, not only decline to purchase American securities, but make haste to sacrifice those which they already have. It does not meet the situation to say that apprehension in regard to the future of our finances is groundless, and that there is no reason for lack of confidence in the purposes or power of the Government in the premises. The very existence of this apprehension and lack of confidence, however caused, is a menace which ought not for a moment to be disregarded. Possibly if the undertaking we have in hand were the maintenance of a specific known quantity of silver at a parity with gold, our ability to do so might be estimated and gauged, and perhaps, in view of our unparalleled growth and resources, might be favorably passed upon. But when our avowed endeavor is to maintain such parity in regard to an amount of silver increasing at the rate of fifty millions of dollars yearly, with no fixed termination to such increase, it can hardly be said that a problem is presented whose solution is free from doubt.

The people of the United States are entitled to a sound and stable currency and to money recognized as such on every exchange and in every market of the world. Their Government has no right to injure them by financial experiments opposed to the policy and practice of other civilized states, nor is it justified in permitting an exaggerated and unreasonable reliance on our national strength and ability to jeopardize the soundness of the people's money. This matter rises above the plane of party politics. It vitally concerns every business and calling and enters every household in the land.

Harmful Effects to the Wage-Earner.

There is one important aspect of the subject which especially should never be overlooked. At times like the present, when the evils of unsound finance threaten us, the speculator may anticipate a harvest gathered from the misfortunes of others, the capitalist may protect himself by hoarding or may even find profit in the fluctuation of values; but the wage-earner—the first to be injured by a depreciated currency and the last to receive the benefits of its correction—is practically defenseless. He relies for work upon the ventures of confident and contented capital. This failing him, his condition is without alleviation, for he can neither prey on the misfortunes of others nor hoard his labor. One of the greatest statesmen our country has known, speaking more than fifty years ago, when a derangement of the currency had caused commercial distress, said: "The very man of all others who has the deepest interest in a sound currency and who suffer by mischievous legislation in monetary matters is the man who earns his daily bread by his daily toil."

These words are as pertinent now as on the day when they were uttered, and ought to impressively remind us that a failure in the discharge of our duty at this time must especially injure those of our countrymen who labor, and who, because of their number and condition, are entitled to the most watchful care of their Government.

It is of the utmost importance that such relief as Congress can afford in the existing situation be afforded at once. The maxim, "He gives twice who gives quickly," is directly applicable. It may be true that the embarrassments from which the business of the country is suffering arise as much from evils apprehended as from those actually existing. We may hope, too, that calm counsels will prevail, and that neither the capitalists nor the wage-earners will give way to unreasoning panic and sacrifice their property or their interests under the influence of exaggerated fears. Nevertheless, every day's delay in removing one of the plain and principal causes of the present state of things enlarges the mischief already done and increases the responsibility of the Government for its existence.

Congress Invoked to Act Promptly.

Whatever else the people have a right to expect from Congress, they may certainly demand that legislation condemned by the ordeal of three years' disastrous experience shall be removed from the statute books as soon as their representatives can legitimately deal with it. It was my purpose to summon Congress in special session early in the coming September, that we might enter promptly upon the work of tariff reform, which the true interests of the country clearly demand, which so large a majority of the people, as shown by their suffrage, desire and expect, and to the accomplishment of which every effort of the present administration is pledged. But while tariff reform has lost nothing of its immediate and permanent importance, and must in the near future engage the attention of Congress, it has seemed to me that the financial condition of the country should at once and before all other subjects be considered by your honorable body.

I earnestly recommend the prompt repeal of the provisions of the act passed July 14, 1890, authorizing the purchase of silver bullion, and that other legislative action may put beyond all doubt or mistake the intention and the ability of the Government to fulfill its pecuniary obligations in money universally recognized by all civilized countries.

Grover Cleveland

A Friendly Wasp.

A gentleman becoming annoyed by the persistent buzzing of a wasp about his head, knocked it down with his newspaper. It fell through an open window upon the sill apparently dead. Only apparently, for a few seconds later, to the observer's astonishment, a large wasp flew on to the window sill, and, after buzzing around the injured one a second or two, began to lick it all over. After this treatment (which may have been a kind of massage) the sick wasp seemed to revive, and his friend then dragged him gently to the edge, grasped him around the body and flew away with him. Evidently the stranger, finding a wounded comrade, gave some aid to restore him preliminary to removal to a place of safety for further treatment, and then carried him there. This brave little wasp acted like a good Samaritan, who found a man "half-dead," "bound up his wounds, pouring on them oil and wine," and "brought him to an inn and took care of him."

A Murderer Suicides in a Coffin.

Henry Merrill, aged 60, of Wardner, Idaho, who murdered a man last June, was found dead in a coffin the other day. He crawled into the casket and after lying down put a bullet through his brain.

EDWARD KUHN and family, living near Meltzer, noticed a peculiar taste in his food, a few nights ago. The family had all been away from home during the day. When they returned the cellar door was found broken open, but nothing was missing about the premises. An examination of the sugar bowl, salt dishes, and coffee can revealed a large quantity of strychnine. It was a very narrow escape for the entire family, as a large quantity of the poison had been placed among the eatables.

An advance copy of last week's report of the Indiana weather service, compiled in co-operation with the agricultural experiment station at Purdue University says: The temperture and sunshine during the past week were excessive, and although local rains prevailed over the State, temporarily benefiting the growing corn and potatoes, crops were reported at the end of the week as suffering from drouth, except in portions of Southern Indiana. The dry weather has affected the crops most severely in the northern portion of the State, and reports from some of the northern counties indicate that the oats crop will be almost an entire failure. Wheat threshing is about completed, and plowing for fall wheat has commenced in some sections of the State. Late reports say that the quality of the grain is very good, but the yield is not so large as was expected. Without exception pastures are reported as very short and dry, and in some instances farmers have been compelled to feed their stock as in winter. Late potatoes, already suffering from drouth, have been injured by bugs in all sections of the State. Reports again indicate that the melon crop will be unusually large and fine. Pears are in better condition than other fruits, and grapes have apparently suffered but little injury from the dry weather.

WHEAT took a tumble at Greensburgh recently. The fall was caused by the west end of the brick flowering mill of Gebs & Habeg giving way and 15,000 bushels were dumped into Lincoln street. The building was two stories high, and the west end was used for storing grain. Under this part of the building the office was located. A few moments before the wall collapsed several persons were in the office making settlements. Persons going along the street heard the creaking of the building and gave the alarm, and those in the office saved their lives by a hasty exit.

SIMEON STEWART, one of the prominent farmers of Rush County, died suddenly while at work on a threshing machine. He was 68 years old. He was the father of Alonzo Stewart, the county surveyor.

The Great Hatton Garden Swindle, Written for This Paper.

BY J. M. BARRIE.

CHAPTER I.

"Vell! vell! vell!" cried Mr. Vanderstroom—Cornelius Vanderstroom, if you please, diamond merchant, formerly of Port Elizabeth, South Africa, and now of Hatton Garden—in sharp staccato explosions of broken-English astonishment, as he let his morning paper fall and bounded out of his chair, like the excitable India-rubber ball of humanity that he was.

"Vell! I never vos seen anytinks like it—never!"

"Like what, dear?" queried his more phlegmatic English better-half, as she set her cup down and calmly began chipping her second egg.

"Like vat? Vy, like dis!" Mr. Vanderstroom stooped, picked up the fallen sheet, and in the effort tilted all the superfluous blood out of his body into his adipose head. "Like dis, sheepshead, dis—pah! I can't call him anytinks strong enough except in Dutch!"

The indignant little merchant hurried to the window, the more reclusefully to let off some appropriate adjectives occurring to him in his native tongue.

"There, there, Cornelius," said his lady, soothingly, "don't upset yourself for business. What have you lighted on in the paper—anything disquieting from the mines at the Cape?"

"Matilda Yane," replied the ruffled husband, as he resumed his seat at the breakfast table, "you English people alvays vos a cool as ole Zuyder Zee, but ven I reads of such tiefs, such r-r-rascals, such r-r-roppers, I runs right out of mine head and I gets excited!"

"Cornelius, be calm—courting apoplexy in that manner. Why, the papers are always full of thieves and robbery."

"Dat's vot makes me so vild!" yelled Cornelius, in tones suggestive of a return to his native expletives. "Vere vould be your tiefs and r-roppers if peoples vos more sharp? Listen—I read you dis."

Mr. Vanderstroom gave his paper a sharp punch in the middle of one of its columns to straighten it out and the better to bring his rolling raisin eyes to bear upon the paragraph which had so suddenly provoked his ire.

"Daring Robbery at a City Bank;" "Successful Theft of Over £11,000," he read. And then in his best Bavarian version of her Britannic Majesty's English, he rendered to his wife a full, true and particular account of how a young "walk" clerk belonging to a certain city bank had been very neatly "lifted" the day before of that substantial sum. The clerk, it appeared, in the course of his usual rounds, had entered a bank in the neighborhood of the Royal Exchange, and, proceeding to the counter to present some checks and bills for collection had laid his sachel down in front of him. As he placed it on the counter he felt a touch on his left shoulder, and turning round, was asked by a man of gentlemanly exterior, standing near, whether he would direct the questioner to another bank close by. To give the stranger the required information was but the work of a moment, but on turning his head again to the counter the young clerk was horrified to find that his sachel containing Bank of England notes to the value of $11,590 had vanished.

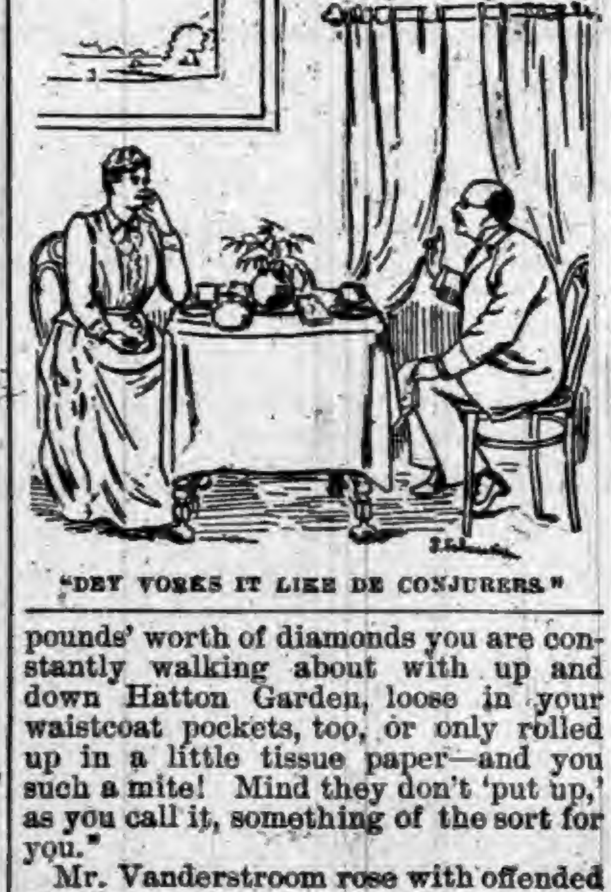
"How lucky," exclaimed Mrs. Vanderstroom, "that the sachel held no gold!" Of course the notes will be stopped, as the numbers——"

"Matilda Yane," interposed the diamond merchant, severely, "you vos like all de voomans—you yump to gonglusions. If de notes vos come into an innocent holder's hands, de Bank of England must pay."

"But," replied his wife, determined to be credited with at least one item of discovery, "if the person who asked the way of the clerk took the sachel from under the young man's very nose, why——"

"Dere you vos again, Yane—yumping!" shouted her peppery spouse. "De barty vat took de sachel vos annoder man on de odder side. Dere vos, p'raps, two, dree of dem—vat dey call a 'put-up yob.' Mit all dees dricks dey vorks it like de conjurers—it's de quickness of de hand deceives de eye."

"Oh, Cornelius—Corny, dear! let this be a warning to you to be careful. You know the thousands and thousands of pounds' worth of diamonds you are constantly walking about with up and down Hatton Garden, loose in your waistcoat pockets, too, or only rolled up in a little tissue paper—and you such a mite! Mind they don't 'put up,' as you call it, something of the sort for you."



"DEY VORKS IT LIKE DE CONJURERS."

Mr. Vanderstroom rose with offended dignity; gulped down another yearning to return to his native Dutch; walked into the hall, tapped the barometer, jerked himself into a remarkably tight and appalling short covert coat—quite oblivious of the fact that in the struggle between his redundant figure and his restricted upper covering he had contrived to scrape a very fat pocket-book out of the breast pocket of his frock coat and drop it into the thick carpeting of the passage—brushed his hat, placed it with a defiant tap on his head; and then, with the hall door in his hand, he drew himself up to his full five feet-three boundary of impressiveness, as he said to his wife, who had followed him.

"Matilda Yane, if dey can come any of dere schwindling dricks over me, I makes dem a breasant of all dey lays dere fingers on. De quickness of de hand vill never keep pace mit de rapidity of dis child's eye—he vasn't built dat vay!"

And with these emphatic words, delivered with a tap on the side of the nose and a sagacious wink of the eye, Mr. Cornelius Vanderstroom executed a dignified waddle down the road in the direction of his train, while his wife, turning round in the hall, when her lord and master was out of sight, discovered and immediately took possession of the dropped pocket-book.

CHAPTER II.

When the diamond merchant returned from business to his suburban home that night he was a strangely altered man. The starch and buckram of the morning's exit had vanished. A limp, invertebrate exterior, combined with "a dejected havior of the visage," silently attested that, like Hamlet in his affliction, he had that within him "which passeth show."

Mrs. Vanderstroom, however, seemed oblivious of the change. They had no company at dinner, so they sat down to a tete-a-tete repast, at which the lady had to do all the talking, for poor Vanderstroom had evidently returned to the monosyllabic period of primeval speech. The music in the drawing-room was bereft of its customary charms to Cornelius just as the last cigar and "night cap" seemed destitute of fragrance and consolation. But, all unmindful of such matters, his wife alternately rattled on the piano and chattered through the evening, until the stable clock chimed half-past 11, and it was time to go to bed.

A married man's couch is the last place in which he should attempt to hide a secret sorrow. Vanderstroom knew instinctively that it was all up with him the moment he slid between the sheets. For breathes there a Benedict in bonnie England who would be permitted to close his eyes and banish care by slumber without first imparting the cause of his discomfort to his wife? Although Mrs. Vanderstroom knew well enough what was on her husband's mind, it did not suit that estimable lady's purpose to alleviate his distress until she had proved to him in a practical manner that he was far from the careful custodian of his own property he invariably represented himself to be. Moreover, she liked, in common with the rest of her sex, to have any superfluous money there might be about in her own safe keeping, and now such a chance as she had never dreamed of in her wildest dreams presented itself. With it came the opportunity to read her lord a lesson, and prove to him that he was not such a cock-of-the-walk as he imagined, and that henceforward, if there was any crowing to be done, it might just as well be undertaken by the hen.

There was no sleep for Cornelius that night until his bedroom had been turned into a star chamber, with his wife as grand inquisitor, and the bed for the rack. Slowly, but surely, the dreadful confession was wrung from him. Humbly he had to disclose the nature of the loss he firmly believed he had sustained—to abjectly own that he had been robbed in broad daylight—in his train, perchance—he, the astute, clever Cornelius, robbed like a common country bumpkin of his pocket-book, containing £3,500 in Bank of England notes, which must have been abstracted from his undercoat somewhere between his home and Hatton Garden; for when he reached his office that morning it was gone.

Mrs. Vanderstroom listened in a kind of ecstasy of female triumph to her husband's agonized confession of male fallibility. Nor was it until she had extracted from him a vow that he would never carry such large sums about with him again, and that he would deliver the £3,500 into her safe-keeping—should it ever be recovered, which seemed hopeless, after all he had told her at breakfast about "innocent holders of stolen Bank of England notes"—and never ask for the money back again, unless the demands of business rendered such a course absolutely imperative; it was only after these solemn promises had been drawn from the unhappy Cornelius that his good lady turned him in an instant from the most miserable of mortals to the most joyous of little men by showing him his pocket-book with the notes intact, as she had found them in the hall that morning, reposing snugly and safely under her pillow.

From that hour Mr. Cornelius Vanderstroom's reputation for phenomenal cuteness in the detection of crime, his dissertations on rogues and roguery, as well as the customery allusions to his distinctive dexterity in the detection of "put up yobs," had to be confined to his city circle of admirers. But events were ripening destined to shatter the diamond merchant's reputation for sharpness as much abroad as at home.

CHAPTER III.

It was afternoon in Hatton Garden. Cornelius was sunning his consequential little rotundity on his office steps, with his heavily ringed fingers thrust in the arm-holds of his waistcoat and his dumpy little legs stretched importantly apart. A benevolent complacency suffused his features, for he had just lunched and felt good. Moreover he had transacted a fair business in the morning, and among other dealings had got rid of a parcel of slightly "off color" diamonds to an amateur at close on "water" prices, and to add to this stroke of luck he had just played old De Beers at dominos for his lunch at the Cosmopolitan cafe at the top of "The Garden" and won. Therefore, having had it all his own way, the street was just then a temporary Garden of Eden to Cornelius, with never a snake in the landscape.

Suddenly the little diamond merchant's attention was attracted to a handsomely appointed mail-phaeton coming down the street from the Holborn-circus end. Cornelius flattered himself that he was something of a judge of horseflesh, having several showy animals at home; and when the pair of high-stepping bays attached to this remarkably smart turn-out pulled up with a suddenness that nearly sent them on their haunches at his own doorstep, he was free to confess that prettier bits of blood couldn't be met with anywhere between the viaduct and Hyde Park corner. The American-looking, soldierly gentleman who was apparently the owner of the phaeton was not driving, which was at once accounted for when Vanderstroom observed that the right sleeve of the stranger's closely buttoned gray frock-coat was empty, and pinned across his breast.

"Military, by the cut!" ejaculated Cornelius to himself, as he surveyed the new arrival, marked the missing arm, and noted the cockade in the hat of the neat, middle-aged groom who so deftly manipulated the bays.

"Guess this should about fix the location," cried the one-armed military-looking gentleman in unmistakable Yankee accents, as he descended from his seat in the carriage, scanned the memorandum in his hand, and then surveyed the house in which Cornelius had his office.

"American twang," thought the diamond merchant, continuing his mental notes. "Yankee Colonel or General, may be, who has made his pile in pork, petroleum or wooden nutmegs. I wonder if he's after diamonts."

Diamonds, beyond a doubt! More luck for Cornelius that day!

For Vanderstroom's name was on the stranger's lips as soon as his patent leathers had touched the pavement.

"Wall, wall, and he was Mr. Vanderstroom!—wall, now, really!"

"Guessed" they had better "sail right in," as he wanted to inspect some stones for a present he contemplated "springing" on his wife. Fact was, he'd had a "bonanza cable" from Arizona that morning telling him that in his new mine they had not only come upon a fresh reef, but "they'd struck it tarnal thick." "Calculated" he wouldn't know where to stow all the silver, if Arizona "crowded it in on him so all-fired fast." But "guessed" that diamond buying would help as quick as any other way "to knock the bottom out of Pot-shot Gulch."

With these and sundry other explanatory interjections, by the way, all of them delivered with that unconventional freedom of speech and breeziness of style for which your genuine "down-Easter" is held to be peculiar, the American and the diamond merchant found themselves in the first-floor office.

Cornelius Vanderstroom impressively took a bunch of keys from his pocket, and with considerable ceremonial opened the great safe. The stranger started at the array of jewels that met his gaze. Cornelius felt flattered at the involuntary tribute paid to his collection. Diamonds, both rough and cut, were quickly brought forth and cunningly displayed in the most suitable light on back-grounds of black velvet. But the polished gems alone met with the General's—yes, assuredly a General, by his easy air of command—approval. And what a nice, discriminating eye the American had for first-water gems! In vain Cornelius tried to palm off inferior qualities at high-grade rates. The stranger wasn't to be had. So the merchant's respect for his customer rose in proportionate ratio with his fastidiousness. At last a number of beautiful Pneil, or river, diamonds and some perfect specimens from the Jagerfontein mines were selected. They constituted the very pick of Vanderstroom's great safe. And as they were placed on one side to be appraised, the little Dutchman sighed to discover how the expert eye of the Arizona silver-king had traveled over all the straw-tinted gems and fastened only on the blue-white stones.

A splendid lot, and cheap at fifteen hundred pounds! So evidently thought the American, for at that price the bargain was concluded. And now, about the setting? What would Mr. Vanderstroom recommend? For himself, the American fancied the two finest Pneil stones for earrings, and the remainder in a spray—a cataract of brilliancy which, he guessed, "would take the shine out of Niagara, and make Pot-shot Gulch sit up."

Ultimately, it was arranged that Vanderstroom should get the jewels set, and the litle man seemed proud of the confidence reposed in him. In six weeks at the latest the Dutchman undertook to deck the ears and bosom of the stranger's wife with the loveliest ornaments that ever struck envy into female heart.

Then there was a pause.

The American seemed instinctively to divine the uppermost thought in Cornelius' head. With a pleasant smile he unbuttoned his coat with his only hand—the left. Then he was met by a difficulty, which Vanderstroom was requested to assist in overcoming.

Would he mind putting his hand in his—the stranger's—left inside breast pocket and get his pocket-book out for him? Ever since "those dod-gasted Indians" had winged him, remarked the American with a laugh, he had made his wife his right hand; but as she wasn't there he must ask Mr. Vanderstroom to take her place and help him to "weigh out some dollars."

Vanderstroom, thus invited, dipped his chubby little hand into his patron's pocket and produced the case.

It was a handsome Russia leather affair, bound with silver and having an autograph cut in the same metal on the back. But Cornelius placed the pocketbook in the American's hands without stopping to decipher the name.

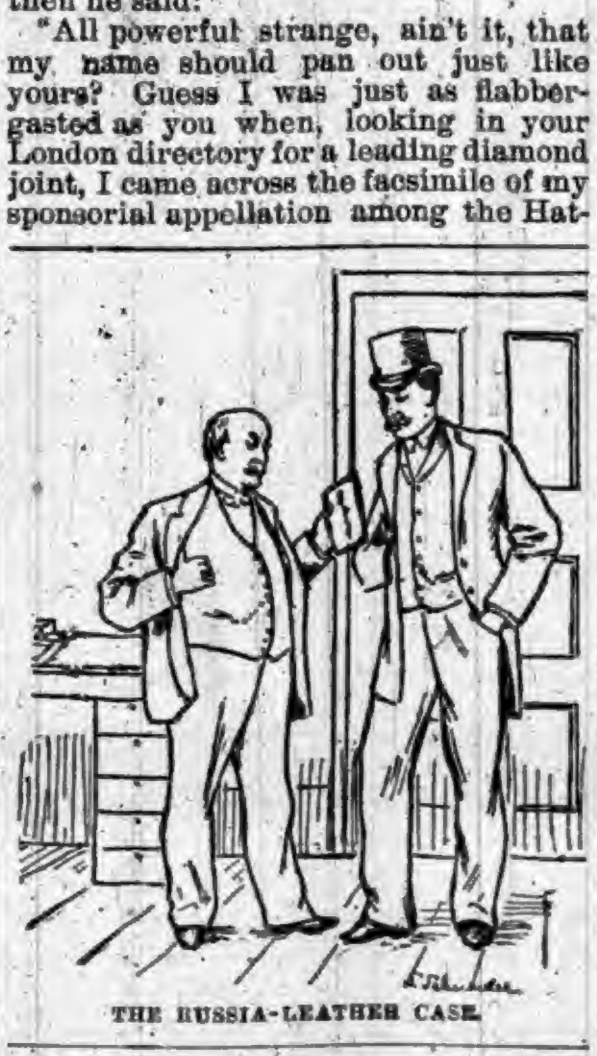
The stranger laughed again, and returned it to the diamond merchant with a request that he would read it.

The little man gave a start and a short, sharp cry of surprise sprang to his lips, for he could scarcely credit his eyes with what he read. There, on the American's costly case, he saw his own unusual name:

CORNELIUS VANDERSTROOM.

The American lighted a cigar, took a minute or so to get it into good working order, during which he seemed to be deriving infinite amusement from the merchant's astonished looks, and then he said:

"All powerful strange, ain't it, that my name should pan out just like yours? Guess I was just as flabbergasted as you when, looking in your London directory for a leading diamond joint, I came across the facsimile of my sponsorial appellation among the Hatton Garden community. That's what drew me to you, for it might be that we're kinder related."



THE RUSSIA-LEATHER CASE.

The little Dutchman had never heard of any kith or kin in America. But then the tribe of Vanderstroom had scattered from the Hague and Amsterdam years and years ago, and some of them might have found their way to the colonies on the Hudson. Yes; no doubt the General was right—blood as well as business ties existed between them. And, as he knew full well the old settlers from the Low Countries formed the major portion of the aristocracy and wealth of the new world, Cornelius was by no means loath to welcome so desirable a family connection, especially when the taste for diamonds, the dashing bays, and the untold wealth of Pot-shot Gulch were borne in mind.

No sooner, however, had these thoughts taken form within the active brain of Cornelius than a horrible suspicion presented itself what if this newly discovered kinsman had only found him out in order to obtain a lengthy credit for the jewels he had selected? The bare idea was too appalling for contemplation, and it caused the little merchant to break out into a profuse perspiration.

The American was evidently a thought-reader of the highest order. He produced a Bank of England note from his pocketbook for 100 pounds and laid it on the table. "Bills," said he, adroitly calling in alliteration's artful aid, "were bully boys for business." No getting over them. He liked a fair and square deal—he did, and no favors asked. This was how he guessed he'd like to trade. He was a stranger in Europe, and he'd ask no man to go bail for him—no siree. That 100 pound bill was, he calculated, a better introduction than all the names and references "on this played-out side of the herring-pond."

The diamond merchant rubbed his hands, smiled effusively, and was evidently of his namesake's way of thinking.

"Wall, then, s'pose we fix it this way," continued the American, in his uncompromising Yankee style; "you hold this hundred pound bill and wire me to my hotel when the fixings to the diamonds are complete. Then I come along to your bureau and plank down fourteen hundred more, and you hand over the jewels. That way I don't plank down too much beforehand for what I haven't got, and you don't part with what you've not been fully paid for."

Really, after all, there was a downright honest way of trading about these New England folk that put your old world methods to the blush. So thought the little merchant as he consigned the note to his waistcoat pocket and took down the address of the American's hotel—a first-class one, by the by, in Northumberland avenue.

Then with many expressions of mutual esteem the two Vanderstrooms parted.

Salmon Have Homes.

In their journey up the streams the first run of fish push on rapidly to the upper pools and head waters, one hundred miles or more, unless prevented by insurmountable falls, with which most of the Labrador streams are well provided. Here fish have been caught sixty miles above the estuary before one has been taken in tidal water. Some of the former remain in the lower pools and are joined by others as the run progresses.

Why is this? Have the fish any remembrance of where they spent their youthful days, and remain there while others pass them?

It is now received as an undoubted fact that every fish knows its own river, but I go further than that, and think every fish has a particular place in the river where it wishes to remain. Were all the salmon in the Restigouche to push on to its head waters would not the greater portion of the river be barren? The turmoil of spawning time on the restricted spawn beds, the turning over of the newly laid ova, could only end in wholesale destruction. Even under present conditions, I am satisfied not over ten per cent. of the eggs deposited naturally ever come to life.

As to the speed with which they travel at times, I have caught two salmon with partly digested caplin in them quite recognizable, and these fish were caught sixty miles above where the caplin is known to come.

An Unmixed Blessing.

There are many things in life that are doubtful, and many things that give but a poor return for what we spend upon them; but I claim for the church that it is an unmixed good, and that what it might do nothing could ever repay. It has the promise of the life that now is and of that which is to come. It gives the best of counsel, the purest motives, the noblest ideals, the loftiest aims, the tenderest consolations, the brightest hopes, and the indebtedness of multitudes to it has been simply unspeakable. What it has done for others it may do for you; what it has been in the past it still may be, and more. But the blessing can only come if you earn it, if you consecrate yourselves afresh to your ideal, if you strengthen the things that remain.

For Purposes of Barter.

The huckster was yelling "Strawberries" and the lady of the house hailed him.

"Will you let me have three quarts for 50 cents?" she asked.

"Yes, lady," he said, handing her out three boxes.

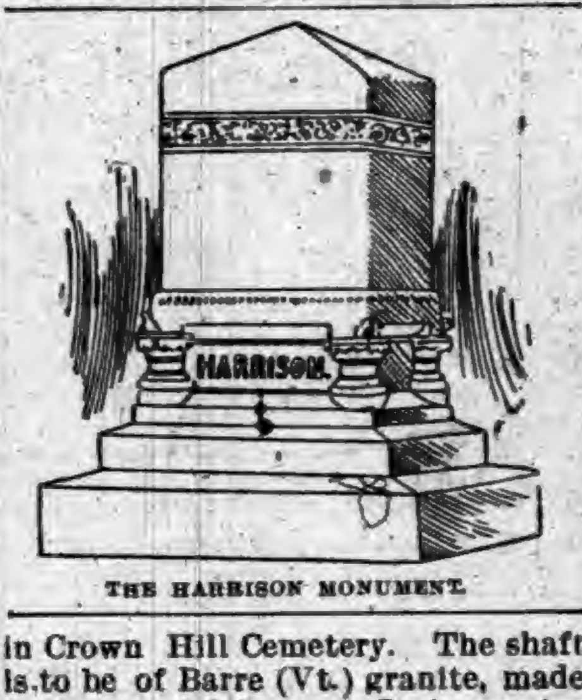
"There aren't three quarts in them," she said, doubtfully, as she gave him the half dollar.

"And there ain't 50 cents in this half dollar, either," he retorted, "but it passes for that much, just the same," and he drove on.

SELECTED A FINE MONUMENT.

Elaborate Shaft to Mark the Harrison Lot in Crown Hill Cemetery.

Ex-President Harrison has given an order for a fine granite monument, to be erected on his family lot in Crown Hill Cemetery. The shaft is to be of Barre (Vt.) granite, made from a special design. It is massive in proportion, graceful in outline and sufficiently ornate to be in harmony with its character and surroundings. It will be made of four massive blocks. Upon the third or upper base will be the name "Harrison," in large raised block letters. At the four corners of this base are columns with tastefully carved capitals, and upon this piece will rest the massive die, around which, near the top, will be a handsomely carved astragal in bas-relief. All the details of the monument will be cut from full-sized models, and when completed will be one of the most noted monuments in the beautiful cemetery where it is to be placed.

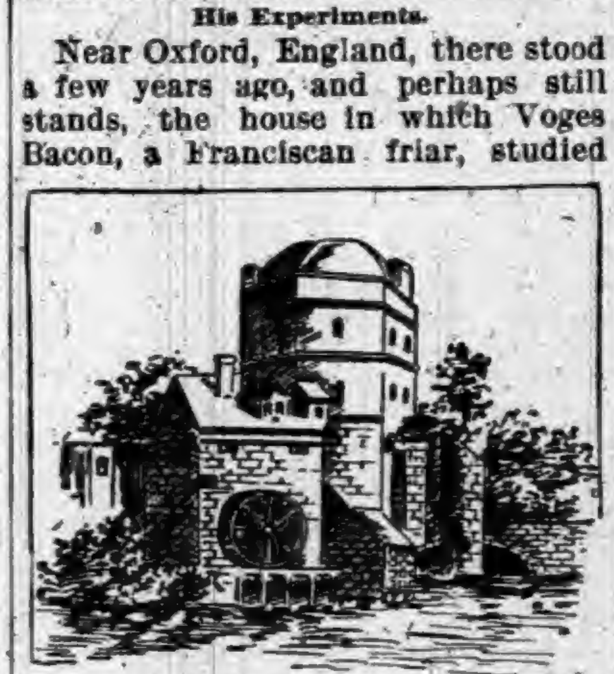


THE HARRISON MONUMENT.

A FAMOUS MAN'S HOUSE.

Where a Celebrated Genius Carried On His Experiments.

Near Oxford, England, there stood a few years ago, and perhaps still stands, the house in which Voges Bacon, a Franciscan friar, studied and experimented. This scientific genius was born in 1214, and died about 1294. Among the inventions ascribed to him are the telescope, the use of concave and convex lenses, the magic lantern, and gunpowder. He was a student of alchemy and astrology, and as a consequence of errors into which he fell was, according to the usage of the age, thrown into prison. He was the author of several works that reflected knowledge several centuries in advance of his generation.



THE VOGES BACON HOUSE.

Philosopher and Poet.

As Tennyson was a thinker as well as a poet, it is interesting to see how he interprets the puzzling half of creation. One thing that he insists upon is the indissoluble bond between them and man. "The woman's cause is man's; they rise or sink together, dwarfed or god like, bond or free; if she be small, slight-natured, miserable, how shall man grow?" That places quite a burden of responsibility upon women, but elsewhere he remarks: "As the husband is, the wife is," which again places the burden on the masculine shoulders. Probably the poet meant to divide it. About the esteem in which she should be held, he speaks in no uncertain manner, "Who does not honor his wife dishonors himself," and "It is the low man thinks the woman low." Somewhat equivocal is this, "It is hard to wive and thrive in a year." Possibly he means to imply that so much good fortune does not often befall a man in so short a time. His various heroines were all a little above the ordinary. "Her eyes are homes of silent prayer." "Eyes not down-dropped nor over bright, but fed with the clear-pointed flame of chastity." "By common clay, taken from the common earth, molded by God and tempered by the tears of angels to the perfect form of woman." "Pure vestal thoughts in the translucent fane of her still spirit." "Happy he with such a mother! Faith in womankind beats with his blood, and trust in all things high comes easy to him; and though he trip and fall he shall not blind his soul with clay." "She stood a sight to make an old man young!" So much and much more did he say of women. And they in gratitude may well apply to him other lines of his—"He rested, well content that all was well," and, "He crowned a happy life with a fair death."

A Bird Story.

Will you allow me to add a touching instance of courage to your pleasant stories? Early one morning last summer I was called to the window by a great noise among the bird people of the garden, and saw the following scene. A young blackbird was standing fascinated by a cat, who was crouched under a bush ready to spring upon him. An old blackbird, on an ilex close by, was uttering loud and agitated cries, and there was a general cackle of anger and sympathy from other birds all around. After a few seconds the cat sprang on the young bird and held him down. At that instant the old bird came down on them. There was a moment's struggle, the bird beating her wings violently in the cat's face, and, I think, pecking at her eyes; then the cat jumped back to her bush, the young bird made off with long hops, and the old one flew up to the ilex, amid a jubilant chorus of commendation which lasted quite some minutes. I never saw this before, though I have seen a robin come quite close to a cat stalking another bird and scold and flap his wings in her face.

The ways of birds are delightful, and in a small garden you can have many by keeping earthenware saucers full of water for them to bathe in.—London Spectator.

THE AUBURN COURIER

OFFICIAL PAPER OF DeKALB COUNTY.

JAMES A. BARNS, Editor.

Registered at the Auburn, Indiana, postoffice as second-class matter.

THURSDAY......AUGUST 10, 1893.

Accident Saturday night on the Lake Shore road east of Toledo. Rails spread, coaches went off and struck a freight train. Three killed.

Last Wednesday evening, Aug. 2, the gold reserve came up once more to the hundred millions required by law. It has been below this mark since April.

The Ft. Wayne Journal is having a hard time to give to the Eagle Lake and the Island Park assemblies, all the space these two modest gatherings would like.

Schuylkill valley mine owners give it out that only Americans will be employed hereafter. They have had enough of the cheap but troublesome Hungarians and Italians.

The President's Message is on our second page and should be carefully read. Mr. Cleveland may not be always right, but he has a clear head and is not afraid to state his opinions. We believe this last message will add to his already high reputation for good sense and courage.

Congress is at work in extra session that begun Monday. Speaker Crisp was unanimously made speaker again, and Dalton of Indiana continues as postmaster. Cleveland reached Washington Saturday, and at once had a meeting of the cabinet, at which portions of his message was read. We hope to see the democrats agree well enough to done good and much needed reforming.

Congressman Johnson, of Ohio, has a plan to increase the volume of currency. It is that anyone who owns U. S. bonds may, if he chooses, deposit them with the U. S. treasurer, and receive therefor U. S. Treasury notes to their face value. The bonds so deposited shall not draw interest while on deposit. But he may at any time bring in the same amount of U. S. curency and redeem these bonds, and when he has so redeemed them they will draw interest again. The scheme is entirely new, but one needs to study it awhile before deciding whether it will work. If it can be made to work safely, it will save the government a good deal of interest, and would also increase the amount of money in circulation.

William Welch, a former Wisconsin pioneer, prints a little paper for his own amusement in Minneapolis, and occasionally devotes a portion of his space to politics. The following is his latest effusion: "We possess the nerve and muscle which has carried us through 72 Arctic winters, and we are still on deck with a steady hand on the helm. But it makes every nerve and muscle vibrate like the throes of a full jeweled Elgin which marks the time of God's finger on the constellations, to hear such political progenies and arrant mountebanes as Depew, Clarkson, Sherman and McKinley charge upon the democratic party the responsibility for the present condition of our finances. There has not been placed upon the statute book of the nation one single law since 1860, which does not bear the republican brand—not one. Yet we find John Sherman as the father of the 54 cent 1890 silver bill, and his clackers whining that they were compelled to take this act or do worse. Do these sham statesmen forget that at the other end of Pennsylvania avenue a president possessed the veto power, and that a two thirds vote could never have been scored in the senate? This dividing up of responsibility leaves nobody responsible. Stand by your guns, O! republicans. You held the fort and commissary department for thirty-two straight years less four, and for the four years you had your millionaire senate. Now you Shermanites kick over the gravy dish and whine at the danb. 'Call you that backing your friends?' Go and hang yourselves and stand not on the ceremony of going." Ex.

Silver Medal Contest.

There will be another silver medal contest held in Spencerville Aug. 12. An interesting program has been arranged. These exercises are a benefit to the public, as well as to the young people who take part in them, and we hope to see them well patronized.

Court.

The leading case last week in point of interest was that of the State against Mull. Mull has been a tough character, having his location in the north part of the county. He had become too intimate with a young girl that Mr. and Mrs. Levi Brandaberry had adopted and were trying to bring up properly. She would not have it that way, and after she and Mull had got into trouble with Brandaberry by their bad conduct, Mull got her to take money from Brandaberry and give to him. She took about $40, but in small sums. So it could not be made out a case of grand larceny, and being under $25 each time, Mull was sent up one year for petit larceny. Butler, the prosecutor, and Gen. Blair represented the state and Judge McClellan was for the defense, and there was a hot fight.

The Ashley Lumber Co. gets judgment against A. D. Yoder of $45 57 for lumber sold him.

John W. Brown was divorced from Minnie Brown.

Samuel S. Teeters was appointed guardian for Isaac Teeters, whose mind has been clouded for some time, he being now at the asylum at Logansport.

Ella E. Baxter gets a judgment of $130.90 against Joseph Brown and others.

Two divorce cases were dismissed, viz: Ida vs John Hevel, and Maggie vs Hugo Elsener.

The case of R M. Lockhart vs W. B. Maxwell, to collect a debt claimed on an old transaction, the jury decided in favor of Maxwell.

The American Building, Loan and Investment Co. vs W. E Sargent et al. resulted in a judgment of $3237 for plaintiff and foreclosure against all the defendants.

J. W. Brown was adjudged to pay $400 to Zella Slentz on a case of bastardy.

An important case came up on a change of venue from Steuben county. Lewis Hendry lost his barn by fire and the National Fire and Insurance Company refused to pay the insurance, claiming that Hendry set the building on fire himself. Judge McClellan was made a special judge to try this case, as Judge Powers did not want to try it and hearing was had Saturday, when after some motions and arguments, Judge McClellan set the trial down for the first Thursday in the October term at 9 a. m.

Geo. W. Betts got a divorce from Hattie Betts.

John Rose the man who stole the chairs and house plants, and a thousand or so of chickens goes to the pen for 18 months on a plea of guilty.

Elmira Todd, a working girl, sued the Anson Hall estate for more pay for working there when Mrs. Hall was helpless. The jury gave her $235.50.

The case between Weidner and Oberholtzer for recovery of land is going on.

Tuesday the jury were excused and sent home till next Monday. S. Z. Dickinson who had taken the place of I. M. Diehl temporarily, went home for good, as Mr. Diehl can now take his place on the panel.

HISTORIC RELIC.

The Guillotine Upon Which Marie Antoinette was Executed Now on Exhibition at the Fair

One of the most interesting relics of the World's fair to be seen is on exhibition at the Moorish palace on Midway Plaisance. It is the guillotine upon which the lamented and heroic Marie Antoinette was beheaded at Paris, Oct. 16, 1793. That this is a genuine relic there can be no mistake, for its history is authentic.

After the reign of terror had lost itself in blood this guillotine, upon which over 1,800 persons were beheaded, was stored away until 1873, when, by order of the French republic, all state property of France was sold at auction. This historic relic was purchased by M. Dubois & Co. for 42,500 francs or $8,500. It was resold to Caston Bros., whose property it still remains. They made an effort to exhibit it at Berlin, but the German government refused them permission, fearing it would increase the horrible feeling then existing against the French. It was then exhibited at Mme. Tussaud's, in London, for some years and later taken to Paris and now can be seen at the Moorish palace.

The platform and guillotine are genuine beyond a doubt. Upon the platform is an excellent likeness and figure in wax of the beautiful queen as she stood before her executioners with her last words upon her lips, "God be kind to my executioners."

Beside her stands the public prosecutor of the day, and in the distance are thousands of sans-culottes ravenous in their desire for human blood of either great or small degree.

The purchasing agents of the United States government have ordered nearly one hundred thousand pounds of Dr. Price's Baking Powder in the first five months of this year. The government exercises great care in selecting its supplies of all kinds, rejecting everything that is not of the best, and the very fact that it has adopted Dr. Price's Baking Powder is proof that it has found it the best of all baking powders. Dr. Price's is peculiarly adapted for export, as neither long sea voyages nor climate changes affect it, this brand keeping fresh and sweet for years while other baking powder deteriorate rapidly. It is guaranteed to the government to be a pure cream of tartar powder, free from ammonia, alum or other harmful substances, and it is also the only baking powder prepared by a physician of high standing.

HARTER'S

The following facts are related by a newspaper correspondent:

"One day while waiting upon a busy street, I placed a coin in the center of the sidewalk and studied the people. A scoer of pedestrians passed over it. Some stepped on it. Finally a woman with a basket grabbed it and the last I saw her she was smiling.

Some may have seen it but were too select to bend in public, but I doubt if any others noticed it. As a rule everybody passes over more good things than they pick up"

The truth of the last statement is beyond contradiction, and is the result of inattention to minor matters. Just at this point is where we want to apply the story to ourselves. Our stock of merchandise enables one to save a little on each article purchased, and inasmuch as most of your needs can be supplied by us, you can readily see how the aggregate saving must be great.

The success of Mrs. Annie M. Beem of McKeesport, Penn., in the treatment of diarrhœa in her children, will undoubtedly be of interest to many mothers. She says; "I spent several weeks in Johnstown, Pa., after the great flood, on account of my husband being employed there. We had several children with us, two of whom took the diarrhœa very badly. I got some of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhœa Remedy from Rev. Mr. Chapman. It cured both of them. I knew of several cases where it was equally successful. I think it cannot be excelled and cheerfully recommend it." 25 and 50c bottles for sale by Robbins & McCord.

Mr. Thomas Batte, editor of the Graphic. Texarkana, Arkansas, has found what he believes to be the best remedy in existence for the flux. His experience is well worth remembering. He says: "Last summer I had a very severe attack of flux. I tried almost every known remedy, none giving relief. Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhœa Remedy was recommended to me. I purchased a bottle and received almost immediate relief. I continued to use the medicine and was entirely cured. I take pleasure in recommending this remedy to any person suffering with such a disease, as in my opinion it is the best medicine in existence." 25 and 50 cent bottles for sale by Robbins & McCord.

They took supper with Horatio Hines, and of course had a pleasant visit there.

The Keeley Institute is keeping up its good work in spite of the hard times. They have a pretty steady attendance, nearly the same number all the time. We believe our local club has put in all the patients their subscription entitled them to. Still we believe some of the patients sent by the local board have paid in some money, which we suppose will either be used to send another patient or else become the property of the subscribers. Our people should feel proud of the grand work the Keeley Institute is doing.

The Auburn Military band goes up to Rome City to-day and to-morrow to take part in the great band contest. They had good success there last year, and are at least as worthy now. Rev. J. A. Krum, of Hudson was here last week on his way to fill his appointments on Sabbath at Piles' in the forenoon and at Lockwood's in the evening. We believe this arrangement for alternate Sundays has been kept up for some time.

Hamilton once more has a newspaper. This time it is called the "Advocate," the first number of which is dated August 3. Thos. P. French, late at the head of the Corunna schools, is publisher and gets out a nice local paper. Whether it can be made to pay or not depends on the interest that people at that place and vicinity take in sustaining it. They should make up their minds to stand by Mr. French, not only with words, but with patronage, and we guarantee he will give them a good local newspaper.

Some matter was sent in too late last week and had to lay over till this. All should remember that communications should be in as early as possible, because, as the day of publication draws near, there may be a lack of time or even of space. We notice frequently that communications come in quite late, that tell of occurances that happened several days before, and they could therefore have been sent earlier just as easily. We are glad to get these items and hope our friends will understand why it now and then happens that they do not appear.

Two of our Garrett friends H. C. Bruce and W. J. Martin came over from Garrett Saturday evening on their wheels, and after a visit with the friends here returned in the same independent way. As each of them will hold down the scales with more than 200 pounds of silver dollars therein they were pretty well warmed up on reaching here. But as the evening was growing cooler, they had a fine time to go home. Both are prominent young men of their city, Mr. Martin being city clerk. Our people will also remember him as an actor of no small ability. He was with the Harry Townsend Company when they went off on their tour from here. The COURIER is glad to reckon these two rising young men among its friends, and is always glad to greet them here, or else where.

At the Rohm farm on the road to Waterloo, the boys report 587 bushels of wheat from 15 acres, or a little over 39 bushels to the acre. About the time their father bought this farm several years ago, we heard it was poor land. It is all right now.

The Clipper is getting partially decent again. It does that regularly as the time for that lawsuit approaches. Nothing so helps a lawsuit so effectually as a character for decency, and even a "temporary character" helps. If it could be interested in about twelve suits a year, coming on at different times, it would be a great relief to a suffering community.

A difficult operation was performed on James Gilliland on Thursday of a week ago. The trouble that had been in his right foot for some time proved to be what the doctors call "death of the bones," which had affected the foot badly. There was gangrene also, and an operation was necessary. Dr. I. O. Buchtel of this place, assisted by Dr. A. L. Fisher, of Elkhart, operated on the diseased member, and now Mr. Gilliland is in a fair way to recover, though of course it takes time to heal up and get well in such severe cases, as a part of the foot had to be removed.

Last week on Tuesday, Joseph Messick, who had been a clerk in the Kiblinger hardware store for about three months, started to go to Goshen, his home, for a visit. He went to Waterloo to take a Lake Shore train there, and while waiting at the station, about 11 p. m., he saw a train coming, and supposing it was on the outside track, stepped to the near track, the very one on which the train happened to be coming. It struck him, and threw him several feet and when he was picked up, it was found he had a bad cut on the scalp, and one foot was injured. He was taken care of till his train came, when he was sent to Goshen. There his foot was dressed, two or three toes being removed and the wound on his head sewed up. We hear he is getting along well.

C. P. Houser has a big contract in slating at Waterloo. He puts new blackboards of real slate into the school house there, including the rooms of Primary D, Intermediate A and B, and the Grammar department. Mr. Houser is one of the most experienced men in the county in work in this line, as many a school house can attest. He used to put on slating and it was of the best, and well put on, many of them lasting a long series of years. Now, however, real slate is used, which, while it costs some more, will out last a life time, and always be as good as a common school slate. Improvements keep going right on. He gets his slate direct from the quarries in Pennsylvania.

In ordinary passenger cars there are nineteen tons of non-paying weight hauled to one ton of paying passenger weight. It is and should be the aim of builders of modern electric railroads to reduce this proportion, and it is believed that on the proposed line between Chicago and St. Louis the ratio may be made as low as five to one.

The thrifty burglar is reported as getting in his work in fine shape all over the country. The long-talked-of ship canal across Cape Cod seems likely to be soon realized. Four million dollars have already been pledged to the work, and enough more is in sight to make success certain. It is a curious coincidence, if not the result of design, that the naval vessels selected to visit the harbor of Valparaiso as an evidence of the friendliness of the United States toward Chili should be the Charleston and the Yorktown. It was the Charleston which chased and captured the Itata, and it was the Yorktown which menaced Valparaiso with its guns after the assault upon our sailors. The selection of these cruisers ought to make the demonstration of friendship all the more emphatic.

A judge in Harrodsburg, Ky., is a veritable solon. A number of negro boys, caught burglarizing a house, were brought before him. They were all young, and he wisely decided not to send them to the penitentiary. Instead he sent out for the boys' mothers, and a dozen rawhides, explained the case to the mothers, and, as the New York alderman remarked to the gondolas, "let nature take its course." Punishment to fit the crime was served up right there in the court room and justice was satisfied. When there is a vacancy on the Supreme bench of Kentucky the Harrodsburg solon should be remembered.

Lieut. Peary and his gallant companions have now said good-by for years to civilization and are heading for the Arctic seas. Two years or more will pass ere much is heard from them, and it will be fortunate almost beyond hope if there is not some tale of disaster to sadden the chronicle of adventures. The expedition is certain to find out more about Greenland, to fill up with details the conjectural trend of the land and to make known a little more about the glaciers and such physical story as can be extracted from rocks and the life of wintry seas. As to anything further it is a toss whether all is not frustrated labor and the chagrin of disappointment.

Kalamazoo has evidently not yet reached the metropolitan stage of development so far as her police department is concerned. An officer who arrested a respectable young couple the other night, and locked them up without investigating the case, has been compelled to resign, and he considers himself lucky that he was not dishonorably discharged from the force and prosecuted into the bargain. Imagine such an incident in Chicago. Conceive of a police officer resigning because he had made an outrageous and illegal arrest. If such a precedent were followed the vacancies on the force would be numerous enough to satisfy even the aldermen who are on the lookout for places for their constituents. Resign? Not much. On the contrary the efforts of the department would be devoted not to making reparation for the outrage but to blackening the character of the persons arrested with a view to vindicating the officer who made the arrest. That is where the Kalamazoo "copper" showed his provincialism.

The San Francisco Argonaut, commenting upon the endowment of the University which bears the name of the late Leland Stanford, says that the property which will come into its possession when Mrs. Stanford leaves this world includes 8,400 acres at Palo Alto, 22,000 acres at Gridley, and 59,000 acres at Vina, and that "if all the land in the three properties which is suited to vine-growing were planted in vines it would represent the enormous sum of $200,000,000 and an annual income of over $11,000,000 a year." The "if," however, is the uncertain quantity which stands in the way of knowing what this endowment means. Many ranches in California valued at millions yield no net revenue, and the great body of the land donated to this university thus far has yielded little beyond the taxes and operative expenses. Until these lands can be rendered profitable no revenue valuation can be put upon them. The real endowment is the $2,500,000 of interest-bearing bonds left in the will by Mr. Stanford, which ought to yield $125,000 per annum to meet the running expenses of the University. Mr. Stanford has done a noble and generous act in endowing the university, but what it will come to remains to be seen.

They are averaging three victims a day now—the grade crossings. As the weather grows warmer and as the conditions become more favorable, the number will probably increase. But even three persons killed or maimed each day is a good average. It means 1,095 people a year, or the population of a good-sized country town. An occasional street car or omnibus smashed will run the figures up even higher. Charles Cook killed at Maywood, an unknown man cut to pieces at Mont Clair, near Center street, and William Blunt mangled by a train at 22d street, make up Wednesday's record. There is no prospect that the average will be reduced. On the contrary, as more trains are put on and as the population of the city increases the death roll will steadily swell. Meantime certain diamond-decked individuals, alleged to be the representatives of the people, continue to attend prize-fights, bet on horse races and manipulate ward politics with a contemptuous disregard of the public demand for the elevation of the tracks. This is a delightful state of affairs, but if the people can stand it the railroads will not complain. As for the persons who are killed at the crossings, they are quickly hustled under ground and forgotten save by some foolish relatives, who go about talking of murder and other unpleasant things.—Chicago Herald.

Marital Rights.

It was on a train going through Indiana. Among the passengers were a newly married couple, who made themselves known to such an extent that the occupants of the car commenced passing sarcastic remarks about them. The bride and groom stood the remarks for some time, but finally the latter, who was a man of tremendous size, broke out in the following language at his tormentors:

"Yes, we're married; just married. We are going 160 miles further on this train, and I am going to 'spoon' all the way. If you don't like it you can get out and walk. She's my violet and I'm her sheltering oak."

During the remainder of their journey they were left in peace.—Philadelphia Ledger.

SILVER MEN FROM FORTY-TWO STATES MEET.

They Declare for the Restoration of the White Metal to Its Place as Part of the Money of the Nation—Eight Hundred and Ten Delegates in Attendance.

Demands Made by the West.

Chicago Special:

The attendance at the National Silver Convention which met in Chicago was larger than that of any previous assembly of like character in the history of financial agitation. The army of delegates assembled overcrowded the First Methodist Church auditorium an hour before the meeting was called to order, and it was early apparent that a larger hall would have to be sought for future sessions.

Eight hundred and ten delegates from forty-two States and Territories, representing all political parties and every shade of political belief, rallied to discuss silver. It was an enthusiastic body of men. They had met for a single purpose, and they kept that purpose steadily in mind. A grave crisis, as they viewed it, had called them together.

When Chairman Warner of the Bimetallic League called the convention to order, scores of delegates were obliged to stand in the aisles, but all took the inconvenience good naturedly, as the convention was so largely attended. After a few opening words, Chairman Warner introduced Mayor Harrison of Chicago, who welcomed the delegates to the city. Among other things he said:

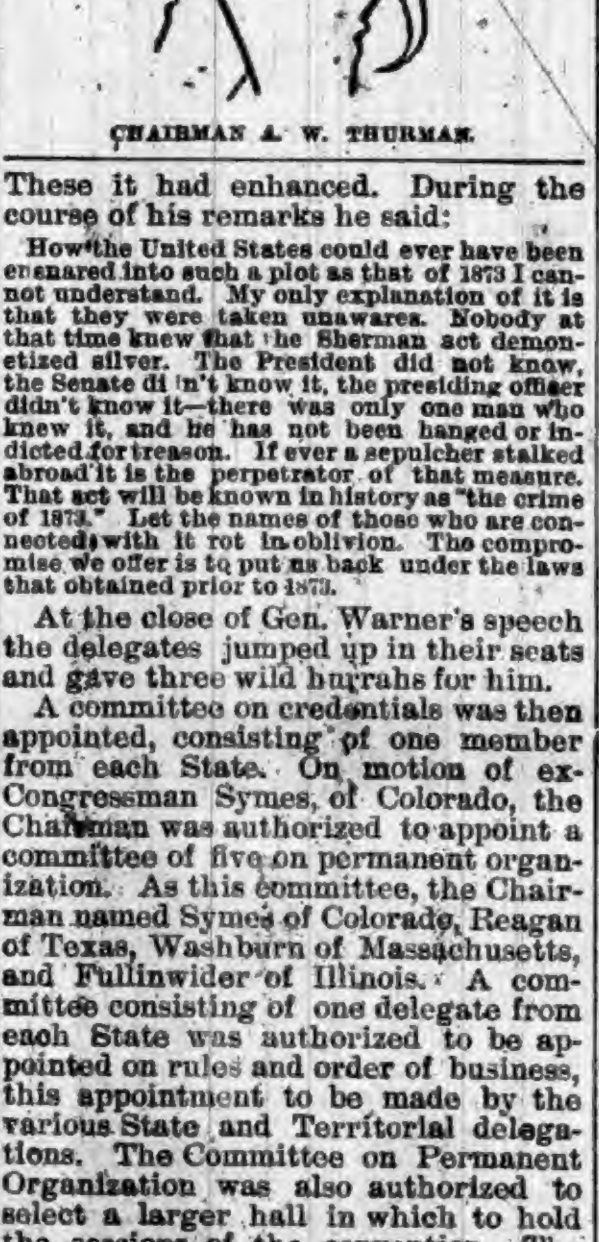
> In almost prehistoric times we know that gold and silver were the money metals of the world. Gold is found in pockets, it is the fruit of chance, but silver is worked out of the rocks by hard, methodical, inevitable labor. They say that those who believe in bimetallism are crazy. If the act of 1873 could be blotted from the annals of American political action, I believe that silver would be worth 129 cents an ounce. Be wise in your deliberations, but be fearless. Congress is about to meet. Give the benefit of your deliberations to Congress, and tell Grover Cleveland what the people of the United States want. I welcome you all.

Thomas M. Patterson, in responding to Mayor Harrison's address, said:

> I know that the Mayor of Chicago is heart and soul in the cause. Chicago is not a "gold-bug" city. Those who so assert know only the opinions of the bankers of this city. The bimetallists are the conservative element of the country. They call us lunatics; crazy lunatics. Do we ask for anything new? All we ask for is that the law of 1792, the law framed by Alexander Hamilton, the law approved by George Washington, shall be restored to the statute books without blotting out a letter or the omission of a line. When the Chicago Clearing House Association bankers meet, let them recall that it is not the tariff measure that adds to the circulating medium of the country, but that it is their policy that has struck down silver and has caused those who have lost part of their money to fear for the remainder and to withdraw it from circulation.

Gen. Warner Makes His Address.

Gen. Warner called Judge Miller, of Illinois, to the chair while he delivered his address as President of the Bimetallic League. The address was an exhaustive discussion of the causes of the present financial depression, tracing them directly to the demonetization of silver in 1873, which he characterized as a crime. By it the money of the world had been decreased one-half, thereby reducing the value of everything but the evidences of debt. These it had enhanced. During the course of his remarks he said:



CHAIRMAN A. W. THURMAN.

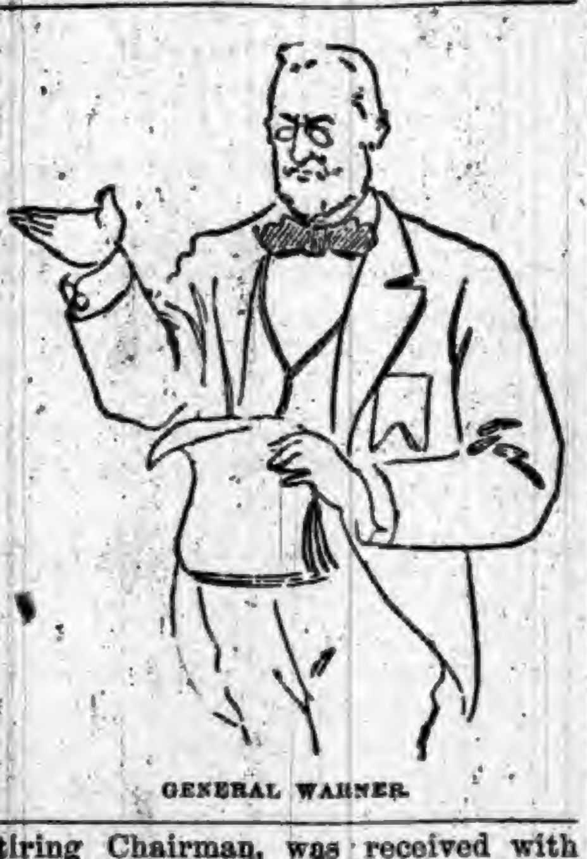
> How the United States could ever have been ensnared into such a plot as that of 1873 I cannot understand. My only explanation of it is that they were taken unawares. Nobody at that time knew that the Sherman act demonetized silver. The President did not know, the Senate didn't know it, the presiding officer didn't know it—there was only one man who knew it, and he has not been hanged or indicted for treason. If ever a sepulcher stalked abroad it is the perpetrator of that measure. That act will be known in history as "the crime of 1873." Let the names of those who are connected with it rot in oblivion. The compromise we offer is to put us back under the laws that obtained prior to 1873.

At the close of Gen. Warner's speech the delegates jumped up in their seats and gave three wild hurrahs for him.

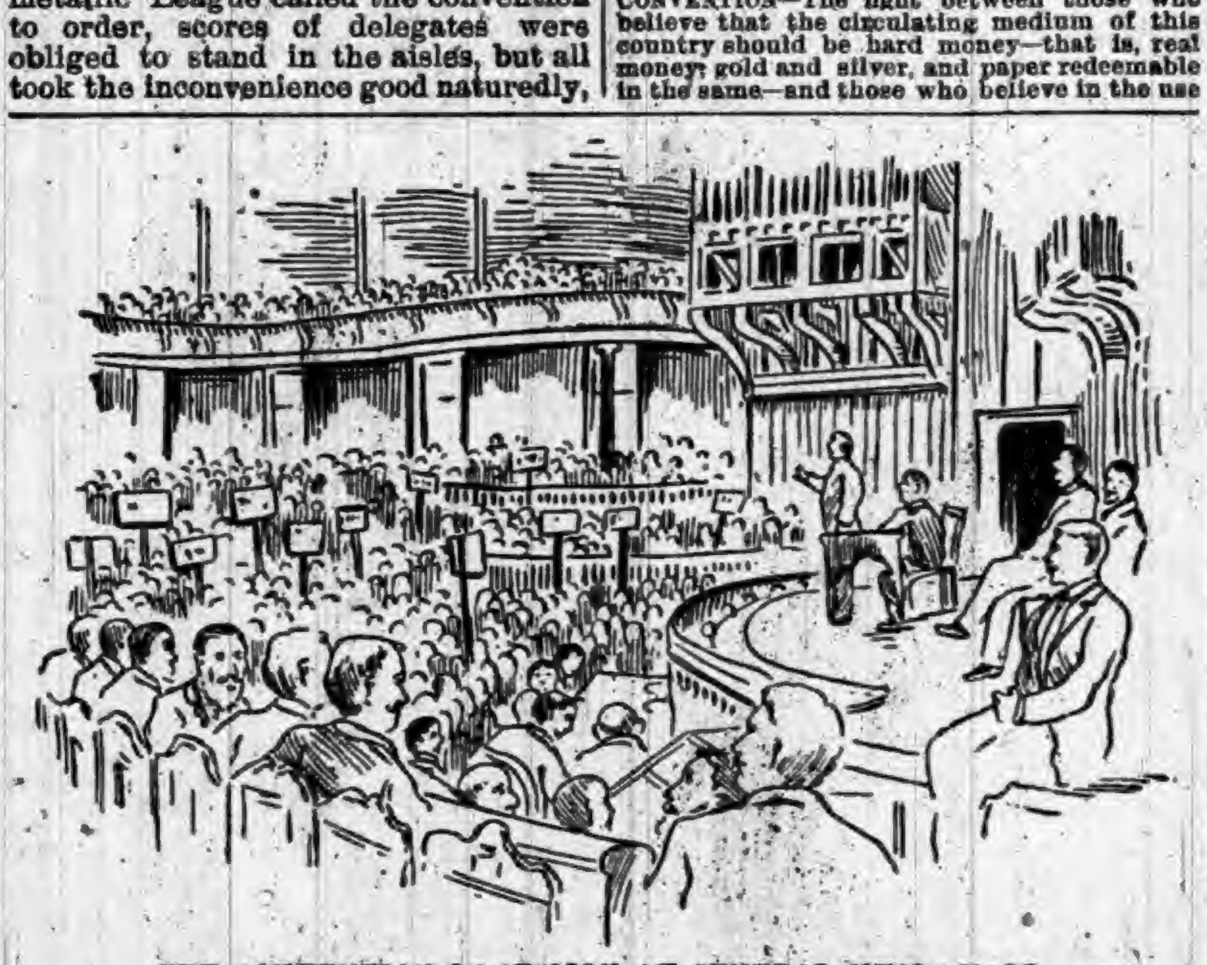
A committee on credentials was then appointed, consisting of one member from each State. On motion of ex-Congressman Symes, of Colorado, the Chairman was authorized to appoint a committee of five on permanent organization. As this committee, the Chairman named Symes of Colorado, Reagan of Texas, Washburn of Massachusetts, and Fullinwider of Illinois. A committee consisting of one delegate from each State was authorized to be appointed on rules and order of business, this appointment to be made by the various State and Territorial delegations. The Committee on Permanent Organization was also authorized to select a larger hall in which to hold the sessions of the convention. The convention then adjourned until 2:30 p. m.

The afternoon session was held at Central Music Hall. The various State delegations filled the entire lower floor. Colorado, with its big delegation, took up a position in front and to the left of the stage. Immediately back of Colorado sat the Nebraska men, and behind them a goodly number from California. Iowa and New Mexico sat side by side to the right in front. Back of them Illinois' big delegation kept up its quarrel during most of the meeting. Indiana, Pennsylvania, and Washington had to find seats back of the railing.

The committee on permanent organization reported commending Allen W. Thurman, of Ohio, son of the "Old Roman," as permanent Chairman of the convention. The report was ratified by a unanimous vote, and Chairman Thurman, being introduced by the retiring Chairman, was received with great applause, and spoke in substance as follows:

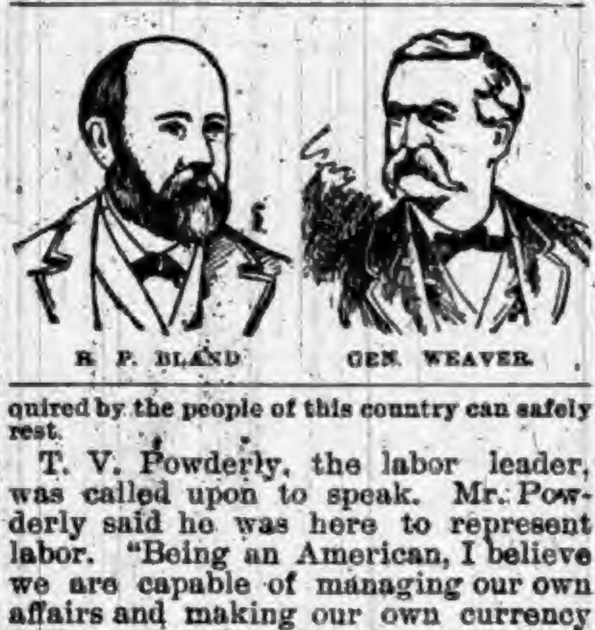


GENERAL WARNER.



THE CONVENTION IN SESSION AT CENTRAL MUSIC HALL.

> Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen of the Convention—The fight between those who believe that the circulating medium of this country should be hard money—that is, real money; gold and silver, and paper redeemable in the same—and those who believe in the use of soft money—that is, paper promises to pay money, redeemable in other promises to pay—is on. Since the late demand in the East to have the Government issue bonds, and the cry that is now made for the unconditional repeal of the Sherman law, charging it, regardless of facts, with all the ills that flesh is heir to, ought to make it perfectly apparent to every thinking man, that should the Sherman law be repealed without substituting anything in lieu thereof, it means the final destruction of silver money as a measure of value, and no man can tell when it will ever be again restored to its former place. No matter what may be said to the contrary, this means, for years and years to come, its reduction to token money, after which the issue resolves itself down simply to the question whether paper money of the country is to be issued by banking corporations upon the debts of the people or upon other kinds of corporate securities, or whether it is to rest upon the broad and safe basis of gold and silver. This is so because gold alone certainly cannot afford a sufficient basis upon which the amount of circulating medium required by the people of this country can safely rest.



R. P. BLAND. GEN. WEAVER.

T. V. Powderly, the labor leader, was called upon to speak. Mr. Powderly said he was here to represent labor. "Being an American, I believe we are capable of managing our own affairs and making our own currency without heeding any demands from across the water," said he. "Governor Waite has been criticised because he referred to the people across the water. He was right. If there ever was a time when there was need of cool and calm deliberation now is the time. The entire membership of the Knights of Labor stand a unit on the question, and they are in favor of free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio to gold of 16 to 1.

Ignatius Donnelly kept the delegates applauding for an hour. He said in part: "This is the most significant event of our era. It is the people rising to the occasion of a great calamity. We are in the midst of the most anomalous condition ever seen on earth. Our country is stored with every treasure that can make us rich—a most fertile soil, an industrious people, labor-saving inventions. And yet, with all these elements, we are staggering into universal bankruptcy."

After the close of Mr. Donnelly's speech the convention adjourned until 8 o'clock.

Free Coinage Resolutions.

The Committee on Resolutions, at the night meeting, practically determined upon a report, the nature of which was outlined in the speech of Congressman Bryan at Central Music Hall. It was agreed to ignore all questions with the exception of that of money, and to demand free coinage and the remonetization of silver. Ex-Senator Reagan, of Texas, was made chairman, and Robert Schilling, of Wisconsin, secretary. A sub-committee consisting of Senator Reagan, Congressman Bryan of Nebraska, ex-Congressman Bartine of Nevada, Ignatius Donnelly, George Washburn of Massachusetts, Thomas Patterson of Colorado, and Mr. Manning of Alabama was selected to draft the resolutions and report to the general committee at 9 o'clock the following morning.

G. A. R. ENCAMPMENT.

INDIANAPOLIS PREPARING FOR THE GREAT EVENT.

Arrangements for the National Reunion of the Grand Army of the Republic—Hosts of Veterans Will Attend—Low Railroad Rates—Ample Accommodations.

Boys in Blue.

Indianapolis correspondence:

Indianapolis is preparing for the greatest event of her life, and for one of the greatest in the social annals of municipalities in this country. The occasion on which she is to give the world an idea of her hospitality, energy and wealth is the twenty-seventh annual national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, which will convene Sept. 4. To the thousands at a distance whose eyes are turned to Indianapolis for the second week in September the question of what will be the railroad fare is of the first importance. The executive board have announced that the railroads have agreed to charge one cent per mile each way, which makes the rate less than one fare for the round trip, a rate never before secured for the Grand Army encampments, and one very rarely given for any purpose. The problem of providing accommodations for the great crowds that have always marked these soldier gatherings in a city having a less number of people than the strangers within its gates, is by no means a small one. Accommodations have been provided, however, for 125,000 people, and the committee holds itself in readiness to provide accommodations for as many more as may come, if only notified in time. The effort to ascertain the probable attendance is still going on.

About Lodgings.

Thousands, not veterans, will visit the city during that week, and must be found places of lodging and feeding. For the accommodation of these, a canvass of all the city was made to learn how many could be entertained in private homes. The results are recorded in seventeen large books, giving them the nature of the accommodations offered, the price, and conveniences as to bath, street cars, etc. The prices asked run from twenty-five cents for lodging and meals up to $2 a day at the best private boarding houses. All who desire to make arrangements in advance can do so through Executive Director Fortune, who will furnish the name and number of available places at the price desired. Visitors coming with their wives can find good accommodations at the best private boarding houses at $2 a day.

The chief problem has, of course, been to provide lodgings for the veterans, the guests of honor. For these eighty halls and schoolhouses have been secured, and will be fitted up with cots. The larger part of the veterans will be lodged in barracks erected specially for their use, free, as in all cases, of all cost. They will have to bring their own blankets, and will have to pay for their meals. But meals of good quality will be furnished at a moderate cost. The board has let a contract to a responsible person, who will furnish meals at 25 cents each for breakfast and supper, and 35 cents for dinner. The largest lodging place will be situated on East Washington street, immediately south of the State Reformatory for Girls, and will be accessible by electric cars direct from the Union Railway Station, and also by steam cars. This barrack will hold 25,000 veterans. It will be situated in an open grass-plotted field of eighty acres, well drained and attractive.

Program for the Week.

The program provides a week of bustling activity and gorgeous entertainment. The first encampment contemplated will occur on Monday night, when the electrical and natural gas display will be made in the grounds of the State House and Court House. While this is going on for the pleasure of all who care to witness it, the veterans will be holding camp fires in various places in halls and tents, and many will hear the eloquent voices of soldier-orators, including General Harrison. The grand parade will occupy all of Tuesday from 10 a. m. to 6 p. m., though the line of march will not exceed two miles on paved streets. A feature of the parade surpassing all previous ones will be the number of horses in the line of march. Commander-in-chief Weissert has appointed 2,000 aids-de-camp, and each of these will be provided with a horse.

The veterans are organizing to be uniformed very generally, and Indiana will have at least 15,000 old soldiers in line, and in addition the militia of the State. The night of Tuesday will be devoted in a spectacular way to the fireworks display, at which the heavens will be made brilliant for two hours with fire and color in elaborate design in a field 160 acres in size and accessible by street cars. Tuesday will also be the night of the reception by the Woman's Relief Corps at Tomlinson's Hall.

The first regular meeting of the delegates to the encampment will occur on Wednesday morning in Tomlinson Hall.

Thursday will be the day of reunions of regimental associations of Indiana. The night will be remarkable for the grand reception of the delegates by the citizens of Indianapolis. Friday, the last day of the encampment, will be devoted to excursions through the gas belt and at night to the street parade of war pageantry. There seems now nothing threatening the success of the encampment.

LOSSES WILL BE GREAT.

Cudahy Will Be Out $2,000,000 and Other Firms Suffer Proportionately.

The total liabilities of the firms which have failed on the Chicago Board of Trade will aggregate fully $5,000,000. John Cudahy's loss alone will be upward of $2,000,000. His assets are estimated at about $2,700,000. N. K. Fairbank will be a loser on lard to the extent of $1,000,000. His property is worth at least $2,000,000. A. W. Wright's liabilities are expected to reach nearly $750,000, and his assets will not be more than that. J. G. Steever & Co. place their failure at $250,000. It is expected that they will be able to pay dollar for dollar. A. C. Helmholz & Co.'s liabilities will reach $100,000. Wright & Haughey are roughly scheduled as owing $200,000. The North American Packing Company owes $250,000. Inasmuch as the assets of these latter firms are largely due them from Wright, it is doubtful how much they will pay. D. Eggleston & Son owe about $1,000,000, George G. Parker & Co., a quarter as much, and Thomas Greig's liabilities will not exceed $10,000.

Nature Demands a Tonic.

We ought never to forget, even those of us who possess vigorous health, that we are wearing out—that the vital clock-work, so to speak, must eventually run down. This, of course, we cannot prevent, because it is in the ordinary course of nature, but we may retard the too speedy arrival of decay by the use of an invigorant which takes rank of every other—namely, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters. This century has not witnessed a parallel in success to this famous medicine, which not only sustains health by promoting vigor but overcomes constipation, dyspepsia, chills, and fever, nervousness, rheumatism, and other disordered conditions of the system fostered by weakness and an impoverished condition of the blood. The feeble, persons convalescing after exhausting disease, and the aged, derive infinite benefit from the use of this helpful and efficient tonic.

Courting.

The Zaparos, a tribe of South America, have a curious way of courting. The love-stricken young man goes out hunting, and, on his return, throws his game at the feet of the young lady who has smitten him, together with a sufficient quantity of fuel to cook it. If she takes up the game, lights a fire, and commences to cook it, he knows his suit has been accepted, but, if not he turns away, a sadder if not a wiser man.

Bridget's Cooking.

"Bridget," said Mrs. De Leon, "can you cook on scientific principles?"

"Sure, ma'am, what's the matter wid cookin' on a range?" asked sensible Bridget.—Exchange.

CUSTOM HOUSE WAYS.

THE EXPERTS ARE LIKE THE SNAKES IN IRELAND.

The Affairs of the Greatest Revenue Port in the World Are Conducted in the Most Indifferent and Unbusiness-like Manner—Indications for 1896.

"Experts" Not Expert.

One of the facts established by the Fairchild Commission, which began a few months ago to investigate the New York Custom House, is that the affairs of this, the greatest revenue collecting port in the world, are conducted in a most indifferent and unbusiness-like manner—so shiftless and reckless that no private business undertaking (except, perhaps, some of the highly protected manufacturing industries) could expect to endure a year if run on such principles. It would naturally be supposed by the uninitiated that custom house collectors, appraisers and examiners are experts in their various lines. But it appears from the testimony submitted that under the last administration almost no one had any definite idea of what were his duties or took any pains to post himself. The appraiser is theoretically an expert, both on the tariff and on the foreign values of goods. He is required to sign every invoice which passes through the stores. Practically Appraiser Cooper knows but little about the tariffs or foreign prices, nor does he sign 1 per cent. of the invoices. He finds it much easier to supply his assistant appraisers with rubber stamps containing his signature. His duties are thus very light—merely perfunctory, as he says. As an example of his expertness and accuracy he testified that about 10 per cent. of all invoices were advanced on one or more items; official tables submitted later showed that less than 1 per cent. were advanced.

The Assistant Appraisers, mostly political pickups at a salary of $3,000, flatter their superior by imitating his lack of knowledge on all essential points. Michael Goode astonished the commission by telling it that if his examiners were to depend upon him for expert knowledge or for instruction as to their duties it would be forty years before he would have become proficient enough to assist them. He did not know the difference between jute and burlap, and could not give the current foreign market price of a single article in his division. He is a plasterer who has temporarily abandoned his trade to serve his country and his party for the slight pecuniary consideration of $3,000 a year. Assistant Appraiser Wm. H. Leaycraft did not know how his examiners determined the quality and value of imported cigars, and professed like ignorance with equal frankness on other points relating to the administration of his duties. From the reliance placed upon the examiners by the appraisers it would be inferred that the examiners were paragons of knowledge and duty. Yet all but three of over twenty examiners acknowledged that they knew nothing of foreign prices except as indicated by invoices. If an invoice was unusually low they raised it. They did not take or see trade papers of any kind and only one of these "experts" had ever been in the country where the goods of his division were manufactured. None of them had data on which to base valuation less than six months old, and in one case it was out of date to the extent of three years. It may be remarked here that the invoices on which the examiners rely are those of foreign manufacturers, vouched for in a perfunctory way by our foreign consuls. The goods are usually undervalued 8 or 9 per cent., just enough to avoid the penalty for undervaluation, if caught.

The investigation brought out the fact that every examiner appointed under the Harrison administration was smuggled through the civil service by an alleged examination for "damage examiner." After a short service in this "kindergarten" department they were "transferred" and became regular examiners, forty years in advance of their superior officers. Such precocity is unknown outside of the ranks of active politicians, where it is quite common. Not only was it shown that certain importers were favorites with the examiners and got their goods in at low valuations, but it developed that the agents of glove and woolen manufacturers had the free run of the appraisers' stores during the Harrison administration. Favorite importers were also frequently invited in to help fix valuations.

McKinleyism is not only a fraud and a robbery according to the indictment secured against it last November, but as enforced it is a farce—the farce department enabling a few importers to get a slice of the favoritism intended only for manufacturers and their like. The poor consumer foots all bills for such management or mismanagement. He probably will continue to do so and to see his funds misappropriated until he comes to the conclusion that it is better to pay his taxes once out of his pocket, direct to Uncle Sam, rather that to pay them several times by allowing them to be collected on all the goods he purchases, whereas Uncle Sam only collects what is paid on those imported; the other and larger portion going to help the manufacturer who agrees to enrich the country by redistributing the funds in some magical way.

Republican Blizzard in 1896.

The Republicans are risking their all on McKinley and McKinleyism. The American Economist, the organ of the Protective Tariff League, is now devoting its energies to McKinley in Ohio. The last numbers contain many pages of letters from protected manufacturers and Republican statesmen out of jobs, answering the question, "Why should Gov. McKinley be re-elected in Ohio this fall?" As the New York Recorder says, "they are all for McKinley. They are all for his re-election as Governor, with the hope that he will be the next Presidential standard-bearer of the Republican party. It is a tribute to a man, but it is a greater tribute still to the sound, vital principles of Republicanism."

We warn the Republicans not to bank all on McKinley. If the Democrats of Ohio nominate some clear, honest, frank all-around Democrat—like Johnson, Harter or Hurd—one who will receive the support of aggressive Democrats both in and out of Ohio, McKinley will not be re-elected. Republicans will then have wasted their last match and will be without fire. Hence they may expect another blizzard in November, 1896.

No Argument Against It.

> Perhaps no one measure will be so potent in freeing us from oppressive taxation of the past thirty years as the passage of an income tax. This tax is right as a matter of equity and good conscience. When the Federal income tax was abolished at the end of the war, the tariff was so laid as to bear most heavily on the poor. The tariff was heaviest on cheap goods. Thus the poor have for thirty years borne an undue burden of taxation.—Macon (Ga.) Telegram.

These are facts which the masses in this country now fully understand, and which their representatives should bear in mind in reforming the laws. During the current discussion of the income tax question no argument has been presented against it. Such a tax, in the opinion of the New York World, is justified by every principle of equity and political economy.

To Trade or Not to Trade.

One of the exchanges of Tariff Reform is addressed to "Traffic Reform Club, 52 William street." Intentionally or unintentionally, the editor of this exchange has struck the tariff nail on the head. Traffic, according to Webster, means trade, barter, commerce, exchange. It is to promote all of these that the Reform Club exists. It believes that when an exchange or a trade is made at least two people in this world are better off than they were before the "swap" occurred, each party to the trade having obtained what was of more value to him than what he had at first. The world is then made richer by every exchange. This is true even though the articles or products exchanged have not been disturbed; they have exchanged owners and are more valuable to their present than to their former possessors. Now, it does not matter where or how far apart the possessors live; one may reside in Ohio and the other in New York, Canada, England, or Madagascar. In any case, both are benefited by the exchange.

Therefore, says the Reform Club, all tariffs which are levied to obstruct trade and traffic are a curse to mankind as a whole, and should be abolished between countries as between states. If there be no better method found, and a tariff is maintained to raise revenue, let it be one that shall produce the maximum of revenue with the minimum of obstruction to trade, and not vice versa, as at present, under the McKinley regime. The Reform Club has induced the country to accept this view of the matter, much against the wishes of a few thousand manufacturers who have been profiting by the obstructions.

A Time for Reason.

The situation in Denver should moderate the belligerent talk of Senator Teller and his associates from the silver States about the desperation with which they will fight the repeal of the Sherman act. What Colorado, Montana, and Nevada want is something that will make times better, not the maintenance of the conditions under which they have become as they are. What has the Sherman law done for the silver miners? Let the shattered banks of Denver answer. Times were brighter for the mining industry between 1873 and 1878, when silver had no help whatever from legislation, than they have ever been since. Every stimulant administered by Congress has proved rank poison. As the huge hoard of silver in the Treasury has piled up the price has flattened out, and the prospects are that if we keep on heaping up bullion much longer consumers will reach the conclusion that it is not worth while to do any more mining at all. They will work to have the Government begin to sell out, and when it once enters the market on that side the mines may as well shut down for twenty years.—San Francisco Examiner.

To Restore Confidence.

With silver purchases stopped, an immediate renewal of foreign investment in American securities might be safely anticipated. Immense sums of money have been lost in Europe through ventures in South America, Australia and Africa. French, English and German investors have in turn been badly bitten. As there is no country in the world so prosperous as the United States, so little likely to become involved in civil or foreign wars, or which has shown such magnificent readiness and ability to pay its debts, capitalists naturally turn their eyes hitherward. Once they should feel assured that the principal and interest of the gold which they might lend us would be repaid in gold or its equivalent, a full flowing tide of foreign capital would surely again set this way. Every artery of trade would feel the favorable effect of the return of confidence thus brought about.—Philadelphia Record.

Specimen Reasoning.

As a specimen of high tariff reasoning, take the following from our esteemed protectionist contemporary, the Evening Bulletin:

> The failure of 200 national banks since Jan. 1 is a part of the change for which a majority of the white voters declared last fall. In Philadelphia no such change was desired, and her banks are in better condition than those of any other city in the Union. Republicanism and prosperous times are still synonymous terms.

The failure of the 200 national banks has been admittedly brought about by a money scare induced by the operation of Republican silver legislation which has been denounced by the Democratic party as "a cowardly makeshift." The people voted to get rid of the makeshift last year; but they were not quick enough in getting rid of the party that adopted it. Perhaps if Philadelphia had her vote to recast in the light of recent events she, too, would repudiate the stupid bunglers who compromised the credit of the Government in order to carry an election.—Philadelphia Record.

A Prospective Lamb.

Before me on a Western road sat two admirable specimens of the genus "hayseed." They were garrulous old chaps and talked and chewed tobacco as a school girl chews gum.

"I reckon we'll lose Ben Gross afore long," said one, branching off on a fresh topic.

"Eh?"

"Yaas—'t won't s'prise me a bit ef Ben goes to New York an' speckelates."

"No; you don't say Ben's a gittin' 's rich 's that?"

"Wall, I guess he's 'bout the best fixed man in our place now, since W. F. Simpkins died."

"Ye don't say? How much d'ye s'pose Ben's woth now, biled down?"

"Wall, ye kaint jest tell. I know o' my own sartin knowledge he has over $40 in the bank, and his crop o' taters ain't dug yit. They'll bring him in right smart o' cash."

"Gee whiz!"

"Yaas—an' John Summers owes him $3.75 on that old game of poker yit. He's slow, but he's good fer it, I guess."

The other was silent for some time, evidently ruminating upon such vast wealth. Then he suddenly inquired:

"W'ats he goin' to monkey with in New York?"

"I dunno. Wall street, like es not."—New York Herald.

Printing on Leather.

Some beautiful artistic effects have been secured lately by printing on leather. These are the results of a carefully perfected method of treating the leather after tanning. The skins are kept free from grease, and, if they are prepared with tannin, must first be steeped in a preparation of sumac. The application of the color can be done in several ways, according to the effect it is desired to produce. It can be done by dyeing the skin and afterward treating it with acids in certain parts, so that the natural color of the leather appears, or priming with a preparation composed of virgin wax, four parts; castor oil, four parts; borax and copal resin, each one part; mixed together and warmed. The castor oil may be replaced by any vegetable or mineral oil.

A Locomotive's "Cough."

The cough or puff of a railway engine is due to the abrupt emission of waste steam up the stack. When moving slowly the coughs can, of course, be heard following each other quite distinctly, but when speed is put on the puffs come out one after the other much more rapidly, and when eighteen coughs a second are produced they cannot be separately distinguished by the ear. A locomotive running at the rate of nearly seventy miles an hour gives out twenty puffs of steam every second—that is, ten for each of its two cylinders.

THE ROYAL Baking Powder surpasses all others in leavening power, in purity and wholesomeness, and is used generally in families, exclusively in the most celebrated hotels and restaurants, by the United States Army and Navy, and wherever the best and finest food is required. Roofed With Salt.

There is a remarkable lake near St. Dorsk, Siberia, which is completely roofed in by a covering of crystal salt. The lake is nine miles wide and seventeen long, and within the memory of man was entirely roofed over by the salt deposit. Originally, evaporation played the most prominent part in coating the lake over with salt, but at the present time the salt springs which surround it are adding fast to the thickness of the crust. In the long ago, rapid evaporation of the lake's waters left great salt crystals floating on the surface. In course of time these caked together. Thus the waters were finally entirely covered.

Pushing Trade.

It is not alone in America that barbers show extraordinary persistence and ingenuity in pressing their wares upon customers. An American who has been traveling in France relates that in Paris the barber who was shaving him stepped two or three times upon the side of his foot.

At last the customer called out:

"Please don't do that any more! I have a corn."

"Exactly what I was trying to find out, monsieur," said the barber, blandly. "We have an excellent preparation for removing corns, for sale at one franc per bottle!"

Old Polo.

In the "Arabian Nights" we read of a wise sage who cured a great King by a decoction with which he anointed the handle of a stick with which the King was in the habit of playing a game of ball, to the end that when the royal hand perspired in the vigor of the play the open pores might receive the medicament. The translator speaks of this stick as a "golfstick" (sic,) but it is plain from the context that the game was played on horseback. It was, in fact, polo. Indeed, the illustrations of the very same edition show the said King playing the game on horseback.

Not a Debtor.

Some years ago the late Prince Adolf zu Schaumburg-Lippe—whose family is the richest house in Germany—and the other princes who belonged to the South German Bund, had a meeting at Frankfort-on-the-Main, when they were entertained in a most sumptious fashion by the towns-people. After dinner, the princes were sitting together over their wine, when the door opened and a small old man entered, at whose appearance all the royal personages, except Prince Adolf, arose and saluted him in a friendly manner. The Kurfuerst of Hesse, on seeing that the Prince remained seated, went up to him, and said: "Dear prince, do you not know the gentleman? That is the Baron von Rothschild." "What does that matter to me?" answered Prince Adolf; "I don't owe him anything."

Sound.

In support of the modern theory that sound does not consist of a given number of countable wave beats, a well-known writer address the fact that a plate of iron, even an inch thick, when used as the diaphragm of the telephone will respond to and transmit perfectly the sound vibrations of the human voice, a result which is almost inconceivable to suppose could be effected by mere mass vibration.

CONSUMPTION

How a Dying Man Feels.

Numerous experiments made in hospitals and upon herioc scientists who have permitted tests to be made upon themselves right down to the moment of death warrant these conclusions: That a dying man may be burned with red-hot irons and yet not feel the least pain. That consciousness may remain in the dying almost to the moment of actual dissolution, but that most people generally lose the power of thought long before death. That in case of death where there seems to be extreme suffering, with writhings and spasms, such phenomena is generally due to reflex muscular action. Also, that fear weakens the muscular system and hastens death, while the reverse may prolong life.—St. Louis Republic.

The ladies of the Presbyterian church gave an experience meeting Friday evening, in which they related how they succeeded in earning "their own selves" a dollar. It was all very amusing to their husbands and their listeners. Some made cakes and cottage cheese and went out like any market woman with a basket on her arm to find purchasers. Some did sewing for others; some darned stockings; one took in washings; one blackened her husband's boots, but was offered no pay, and finally resorted to her penny saving bank. Another who did a "heap" of mending on thirty-three grain bags, and received no pay from her husband, took the matter into her own hands and picked his pockets of pennies until she had the required amount.

Golden Wedding.

Another DeKalb couple has just celebrated the fiftieth year of married life. Wm. Vallou and wife, whose home is near Garrett, called in their friends on Sunday, July 30, 1893, to celebrate with them this happy though rare occasion. They were married July 30, 1843, in Scottsville, Monroe county, N. Y., and in October of the same year came west, settling in Indiana, then a very new and not very attractive country. Mr. Vallou is now about 73 years of age, and his wife about 69. Her name was Hannah Latson, she being a sister of James J. Latson, of Auburn. On this occasion a large circle of their friends gathered at the home, numbering in all about sixty, and though we have not full particulars, yet we know enough of those present to say they had a good time, and that the memories of old days as they were called up, were very pleasant. We know, too, that they had an abundant and splendid lunch, and a generous display of presents and that the guests all left an abundance of good wishes with the aged couple as testimonials of their friendship and regard.

Died.

On Friday evening, Aug. 4, 1893, Lina, daughter of George and Rosa Belle Garman, at the age of two years and five months. The funeral was at the church near Collingwood, on Sunday, Aug. 6, at 10 a. m. The flowers were abundant and attendance was very large, not only from the vicinity, but from Ft. Wayne, and from Auburn and vicinity. The following thoughts are added by one who was present:

"We are sitting in the shadow of a great affliction. The joy and light of our little household went out suddenly Friday evening at 7 o'clock, and since then we have been groping our way through darkness that could be felt. Yet there was one ray that penetrated the gloom. Little Lina was a rare flower, too sensitive for the chilling blasts of this world, so God transplanted her to a more genial clime. She was the youngest in the household, and though three are left to bless the hearts of the sorrowing ones, there was room in our hearts for all.

She died before her infant soul
Had ever felt a wrong desire,
Had ever spurned at heaven's control,
Or ever quenched its sacred fire.
She died to sin; she died to care,
But for a moment felt the rod;
Then rising on the viewless air,
Spread her light wings and soared to God.
This blessed theme now cheers our voice:
The grave is not our loved one's prison.
The stone that covered half our joys
Is rolled away and darling's risen.

TRUSTEES' SETTLEMENTS.

A Detailed Statement of the Receipts and Disbursements in Each Township.

The following shows the annual settlement of each of the township trustees as made with the commissioners on Monday, Aug. 7, 1893. The different funds are shown, the first column showing the amount of that fund received during the year, which includes the amount on hand from last year and the amount received of the county treasurer during the year just past. The second column gives the amount paid out during the year. The last column gives the amount remaining on hand. In the last column, the sums marked with a star show the amount overpaid in that fund. A separate report shows the amount each trustee received during the year for his services. It will be seen that this is unusually high. We are told that on an average a trustee's services in caring for ditches amounts to about $50 a year. Besides, there is the time necessary to attend to the school book matters and other new duties that are laid on them more than formerly. It will be noticed that some funds show a large amount on hand now. This should remind the trustee that his levies in that fund can be made lower, and in some cases almost wiped out. No levy should be made higher than is needed for the uses of that particular fund, and a large balance should be avoided in all cases where it can be done without injury. As the time for making these levies will soon come, each trustee should study these questions so as to give his township the benefit

We did not have time to get all the towns, but notice that M Boland, of the Auburn school board, reports special school fund on hand $3,692.93, and as that is the fund to be used in the new school buildings it don't look as if the town is quite bankrupt. Of tuition fund he has on hand $3,160.47.

SIX SPASMS A DAY.

Dr. Miles Medical Co., Elkhart, Ind.

HAS CURED THOUSANDS

GENTLEMEN: I never lose an opportunity to recommend Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine to any one afflicted with nervous complaints with the assurance that it will not disappoint them. When our boy was eighteen months old he was attacked with violent spasms. Sometimes he would have five or six spasms in a single day. WE TRIED MANY PHYSICIANS WITHOUT BENEFIT; finally our druggist recommended Dr. Miles' Restorative Nervine. We tried a bottle, and could see that he WAS BENEFITED FROM THE FIRST DOSE. We used three bottles, and I am happy to say the child was ENTIRELY CURED. We used no other remedy, and his cure is complete. He is now three years old and perfectly healthy. You are at liberty to use my name in SOUNDING THE PRAISE OF THIS WONDERFUL REMEDY.

AUBURN AND VICINITY.

Some Reminiscences of Its Early Days and Pioneer Citizens.

1872—Continued.

Among business changes in 1872, was the purchase in April of the Eagle Flouring Mills from Mr. Griswold by Isaac M. Thomas and Richard Elson, who for a time conducted the milling business under the firm name of Thomas & Elson Nathan Tarney, owner of the south mill, disposed of that property to an Ohio party. These frequent changes in proprietors did not necessarily mark stinted resources nor unprofitable returns so much as inexperienced and versatile pur chasers possibly influenced by speculative spirit and greatly dependent for success upon employes engaged to operate them. The uniform and prosperous career of I. O. Bachtel who has long given his entire attention to his mills is proof positive of the success that awaits the firm or individual who unites persistent effort with intelligent method.

About the first of the year J. W. Rickel formed a partnership with D. D. Moody for the practice of law and located their office accordant with long precedent in a convenient room of the court house. This firm was regarded with favor; their clientage was large and their practice was remunerative.

J. B. Casebeer and J. J. Littlefield associated to practice medicine and commended themselves to the public by professional skill. Dr. Littlefield, while a competent and experienced physician, had not the staying qualities of his partner to whom he shortly sold his interest and left town. He returned after a brief absence "to settle permanently in Auburn, to be one of her citizens in prosperity or adversity." For some years he won a fair share of social and professional considerations. finally removed west and is in practice at Wichita, Kansas.

Dr. J. H. Ford, rich in medical lore from many successive years of dealing with disorders prevalent in this section but alone unable to attend to his arduous duties in visitation of patients, formed a partnership with Jared Spooner, his son-in-law. This young man was a hard student, a close observer of symptoms and course of diseases, and the effect of recognized remedies. He proved worthy of reliance in time of sickness, and fairly earned a good share of public favor, which he retained during his sojourn in Auburn.

Some ten years ago he sold his pleasant and convenient home, now the residence of W. H. Kiblinger, and removed to Peru, Ind., assigning as a reason for the change, that "The town has grown too healthy for so many doctors." In fact, for the size of the place, the number of physicians was too great and suggested a degree of sickness which did not exist.

It is a pleasure to know that Dr. Spooner is regarded at his present home as a leading physician and surgeon entitled to entire confidence.

In 1872, a lucrative business in all parts of the country, to the agent as well as the manufacturer, was the sale of parlor organs and sewing machines. The latter, supplied with many valuable improvements and selling at less than $25, were then readily disposed of for $85 and more, and cabinet organs have experienced a like depreciation in price.

T. C. Elson was a well known agent at Auburn for sewing machines and thoroughly commanded the adjacent country, taking with him, in a neat wagon, a salable sample. T. B. Totten, now of Kansas, and Chauncy Clark, later elected county surveyor and long since dead, were associated in the sale of both sewing machines and organs—prized instruments for woman's help and leisure's solace. Geo. H. Hoffman, more recently an esteemed citizen of North Dakota, a senator in the legislature and a lieutenant governar for a time, was, in 1872, well satisfied with the humbler occupation of agent for the sale of organs in our town and vicinity.

In June, Mr. Abright entered into partnership with Charles Shepherd, of Ohio, a man possessed of popular musical accomplishments. The firm of Abright & Shepherd successively occupied the store buildings that stood upon the sites of the present Davenport and Hebel Bros' business houses, and dealt in jewelry and musical instruments. Following a dissolution of partnership, Mr. Abright removed to the location now occupied by F. J. Yesbera in the same business, where until his death he suited popular taste by a fine stock and rich variety of elegant articles.

Israel W. Martin & Sons came to Auburn, bought the building formerly owned by T. C. Elson and opened a grocery store. They purchased resident property and competed manfully for a trade that failed to meet their expectations, finally concluding to try some other field, they departed, leaving none but pleasant remembrances.

J. W. Case, having completed expensive improvements largely adding to his store building as well as providing a fine home adjoining, was approached by J. J. Wood and E. E. Williams, parties from Ada, Ohio, with an offer for his miscellaneous stock of dry goods, groceries, etc., purposing to conduct the business upon a more extended scale.

Sale was made to Messrs Wood & Williams about March 1st, and the new firm bringing to their aid a large previous experience and some capital, put in a good stock of merchandise, advertised freely and seemed to flourish for a period, but in the end willingly gave place to Messrs. Miller & Casebeer, who, after various business mutations, also left Auburn for some other locality.

The energy and enterprise of Mr. Case was now directed in a new channel and in company with the Mock brothers, Chauncey and Lewis, he built a scroll factory just across the track of the present Wabash railroad near the station and accumulating a stock of walnut logs worked them up into proper material and inaugurated a lively and promising business.

Finally the property fell to Mr. Case, who built extensive additions and enlarged the sphere of his operations, but financial losses crippled his resources and he closed the factory, which, grown old, weatherworn and dilapidated, has stood vacant the greater part of the succeeding years.

In June, a new saw mill was built and put in operation in the south part of town by Messrs. Ensley & Mitchell. This mill from that time to the present has been continuously and profitably operated by Jacob Mitchell, a veteran at the business.

NEWS IN BRIEF GUSTS

BLOWN IN FROM ALL PARTS OF THE WORLD.

Cattle and Sheep Herders at War—Eight Masked Men Hold Up a Train—Desperate Fight With Robbers—Saloon Blown to Pieces—Disastrous Flood in Germany.

Bloodshed on the Plains.

Rifle (Col.) special: It is reported that war has broken out between the cattlemen and sheepmen on the Mesa north of Parachute and that three cattlemen are killed and the sheepmen penned up in a canoe and fighting stubbornly. The trouble arises over the attempt of cattlemen to drive the sheepmen out of the country. The other evening a well known sheepman arrived from Parachute reporting that thirty armed men appeared on the Mesa among the sheepmen and put a rope around one man's neck and drove the balance of the herders and sheep out of the country and warned the men not to drive the sheep back into the country under penalty of death. Next day a formidable band of sheep men started to drive the sheep back again. The fight is supposed to be the result.

Desperate Fight With Robbers.

Robert Smith, driver of an express wagon, was sand-bagged at Huntington, Ind., by two men just as he was climbing into his wagon at the Chicago and Erie depot, with a package containing a large amount of money, which had arrived on the through express. He drew his revolver and fired three shots at the men. They then closed in on him, and while he was holding one the other knocked him senseless, and both then fled without having secured the express package. Smith is badly used up, but will recover unless blood poison sets in. The officers have succeeded in arresting five suspicious characters who are being held for examination.

Train Held Up.

The south-bound passenger train on the New Orleans Pacific Railroad was held up by eight masked men three miles south of Mansfield, La. The men boarded the train at Mansfield Junction, and when it had pulled out some distance they began to hold up the passengers. Only a small amount of cash was secured. No attempt was made to rob the express or mail cars. It is thought the bandits were frightened off before finishing the job. They jumped from the train and escaped in the darkness.

It Was Bold.

The boldest burglary on record took place at Columbus, Ohio. Two soldiers reported to the police that they had just seen a white man and a negro coming out of Harrington's jewelry store, No. 46 North High Street. Investigation showed that the front door of the store had been "jimmied," entrance gained and fifteen gold watches taken, one of which had been dropped on the pavement outside. A bright electric light was shining in front of the store at the time.

The Crop Bulletin.

Indiana—Upland corn a failure; fair crop on low lands; late potatoes almost a complete failure owing to bugs and draught; stock water scarce; farmers feeding stock.

Ohio—Corn, potatoes, gardens, tobacco, and pastures injured by drought; wheat good yield; oats fair.

Michigan—Moderate rains have mitigated draught in southern section. Corn holds fair; potatoes slightly damaged; pastures are burnt.

Wages of Railroad Men Reduced.

Grand Rapids (Mich.) special: The Chicago and West Michigan and Detroit, Lansing and Northern road have made a general reduction of 10 per cent. in the salaries of all employes receiving $50 a month and over. The reasons assigned are the general falling off in the business of the roads and the consequent necessity for retrenchment in the operating expenses.

Blown to Pieces.

The only saloon at Fairmont, Ind., was blown to pieces. Numerous attempts to establish a groggery there have been made, but the proprietor of this one alone succeeded in opening a place. Angry citizens exploded a charge of dynamite under the building, utterly wrecking it.

Two Were Killed.

A wreck occurred on the Pennsylvania Railroad, about ten miles from Indianapolis, between two sections of a freight train. Joseph Hockett of Chicago, and an unidentified man of Wheeling, W. Va., were killed, and Charles Jackson was seriously injured.

Fishermen Drowned.

A fishing fleet was overwhelmed in the Baltic Sea. Many boats foundered. Seventeen are known to have been drowned and many others are missing.

Burglars Get $1,300.

At Greenleaf, Wis., burglars woke up F. C. Sanger, a storekeeper of Morrison, covered him with a revolver, and searched his house, finding $1,300, with which they disappeared.

Disastrous Flood in Germany.

Berlin special: The Vistula has overflowed its banks in the district around Thorn, East Prussia. Scores of acres are under water and the flood is rising.

DIDN'T WORK

Because of the Messenger's Gun.

A daring attempt was made to rob the American Express Company's car on the Big Four near Crawfordsville Junction, Ind. As the east-bound train pulled out the messenger, C. W. Julier, saw half a dozen men about various parts of the car on the outside. The train was moving slowly and only about 200 feet from the junction. He yelled at them to get away, but they advanced upon him. He drew his revolver, and a couple of the men did the same. One of them attempted, so Julier states, to enter the car and he shot him in the side. The rest fell back and ran across the fields. The train moved on and the wounded man was picked up by people who came from the junction. He gives the name of Ed Brown, and his home is Cleveland, Ohio. He states that he was merely stealing a ride and had no connection with the men who shot at the messenger.

GOTHAM BANKERS HOPEFUL.

They Believe That Very Soon Money Will be Plentiful.

New York special: The opinion is gaining ground among the most conservative bankers in New York and elsewhere throughout the country and is beginning to be generally shared by all those whose position in relation to matters of finance best qualifies them to form opinions upon the subject, that the existing stringency and disturbances must within a very few days come to an end from natural causes. Then will ensue a plethora of idle money, ordinarily an evil, but under existing circumstances something entirely the reverse. The people who have withdrawn money from circulation must presently look back and see that they not only lost a considerable sum in interest but that they threw away one of those opportunities in the world of investments which occur once in an ordinary life-time. They will also see that they played dearly into the hands of the foreigner. They will note that in the space of a few days the Hollander, the Englishman, the Frenchman were enabled to make one to two years' interest on enormous sums of money.

The need for currency gave this opportunity, and it was the foreigner that got the advantage, and not the American investor. Within the last few days, for instance, the possessor of $10,000 or $20,000 in currency locked up in the box of a safe depost company has seen the foreigner's gold marketed at a profit of 5 per cent., while his own money has gone idle. The possessor of $10,000 in currency could sell it in the market for $10,500, which he would receive in the form of a certified check. A general loosening up of currency is looked for within a week.

THEY WERE DAZED.

A Daring Robber Steals $5,000 in Broad Daylight.

The St. Paul bankers are dazed over a robbery at the First National Bank at 11:30 the other morning, a single man being able to seize a $5,000 bag of gold in the presence of twenty people and disappear in a crowd. The police have been searching for him ever since, but there is small prospects that he will be caught. Renaldo Lares, a trusted representative of the Merchants' National Bank, accompanied by I. H. Jacobs, porter of the Merchants', had just come in the First National Bank to make a settlement with the clearing house. The funds consisted of three bags, containing $5,000 each in gold, in a small steel box, together with other money, and in all about $20,000. Arriving at the teller's window, Lares opened the box, and removing the bags placed them on the window ledge close by the teller's window. Resting the bags for a moment on the ledge Lares began to count in the loose money and was busy with this when he heard a step at his right, and turning instantly, he saw the robber grab one of the bags and dart around the post toward the tower. Lares made a leap and succeeded in reaching the door almost as quickly as the thief, and would no doubt have been able to catch him, or at least follow him, had not a man, undoubtedly an accomplice of the thief, here interposed by crowding Lares to the wall and giving the man with the bag a clear sweep. In an instant everything was excitement, the clerks and clearing house men rushed out into the general banking office, but the gold and robbers were as completely gone as though the earth had closed over them.

A BIG BLAZE.

Steubenville, Ohio, Had a $150,000 Fire—Three Business Blocks and Many Residences Destroyed.

Steubenville (Ohio) special: The most disastrous fire of the year occurred recently. It started in the barn of B. N. Lindsay, who was making liniment for a horse. There was delay in turning in an alarm and the fire got a start that it was almost impossible to check. From the place where it originated it spread to the stables and sheds of the Falkes & Neil Company. They were destroyed and the fire then swept away the Lindsay-Falk block. From that point it wiped a number of residences out of existence and was communicated to the Jacob Chapman Block. The office of the Ohio Press was destroyed and with it all the files and everything of value pertaining to the paper. The loss of the Falkes & Neil Confectionary Company is $20,000; the Lindsay-Falk Block, $20,000, and the Jacob Chapman Block, $6,000. The rest of the losses were mostly of houses and stables and will amount to $150,000. The total loss is estimated at $200,000. During the fire a man named Charles Lowe entered the store of his uncle. He became involved in a quarrel with the latter over some money, and seized a hatchet and dealt the defenseless man three terrific blows on the head. He robbed the till of $115, and went from the store to his hotel, where he changed his clothing and left the city. The fire at once threatened the greater part of the town and aid was asked from surrounding cities. An engine was sent from Wheeling.

Not His Cousin.

Ex-President Harrison, who is visiting his daughter, Mrs. McKee, at Beverly, Mass., denies that the Wm. Harrison who was sent to the Denver Poor-house recently was a cousin of his, as claimed. The ex-President says:

"It is a bit of nonsense. I have no cousins nor near relatives in Denver. My only cousin by the name of William married a daughter of General Pike, and lives on the old family homestead in Kentucky. He is in comfortable circumstances. The story is as false as the one printed a few weeks ago to the effect that a man of the name of Harrison or Case, who lost his life on a Norfolk steamer, was a near relative of mine. He was none of my kin, whatever."

Fleeing from the Fever.

Nashville special: A special train of four coaches, containing about two hundred refugees from Pensacola and other Florida points, arrived in the city recently. Some of the passengers slipped off here, but a majority of them took the regular trains out and went further North. The exodus was due to the rumors of yellow fever in Pensacola. Some of the refugees attempted to leave the train at several Alabama points, but were prevented by quarantine regulations. No effort was made to prevent their entrance into this city, and their arrival was not even known to the health officers.

A Girl Outlaw.

Oklahoma City (Okla.) special: Word has just been received that William Whitemaster, a United States Deputy Marshal, has been shot and killed in the "strip" by Lausa Maundas, alias Tom King, the female horse thief. The Marshal was pursuing the daring woman and met his death from ambush. Tom's exploits have made her notorious. She is a well born and good looking Missouri girl on whom repeated punishment has had no effect. This last is her gravest crime. Every outlaw in the West is her friend and her capture will be almost impossible.

Papers Worth a Fortune Found.

Windsor (Ont.) special: James Stuart died in Scotland near the end of the last century, leaving a vast estate and a large sum of money to his son James, then in Pennsylvania, who shortly afterward was killed by Indians.

James' widow, with two sons and a daughter, afterward came to Canada, and settled near the present site of the village of Kingsville. When the widow died an iron box containing valuables, was said to have been placed in her grave. The grave has been opened by descendants of her daughter, and the iron box found. It is said to contain all necessary papers to prove title to over 1,000 acres of land in Pennsylvania, and other property left by the elder Stuarts.

Prize Fight at Roby.

Dan Creedon of Australia, the middle-weight champion of the colonies, and Alex. Greggains of San Francisco, champion of the Pacific coast, came together in the arena of the Columbian Athletic Club at Roby, Ind., for a purse of $5,000. Creedon was seconded by Buffalo Costello, Tom Tracey, Jimmie Carroll, and Sam Fitzpatrick, with Col. Hopkins as timekeeper. Greggains was supported by Joe Lewis, mysterious Billy Smith, Joe King, and Billy Hennessy, with Warren Lewis holding the watch. George Siler was referee. Little betting was done, though the Frisco man ruled favorite at good odds. Creedon knocked Greggains out in the fifteenth round.

Toughs Hanged.

Knoxville (Tenn.) special: It is reported that soldiers at Fort Anderson went to Coal Creek and, taking Dick Drummond from his boarding house, hanged him to a trestle. Shortly afterwards they went to another boarding house and captured a miner named Elkins and hanged him to the same trestle. Drummond and Elkins were the men arrested on suspicion of ambushing and killing Private Laughler. A later dispatch from Coal Creek says the soldiers have arrested a miner named Moore on suspicion of being an accomplice of Drummond and Elkins, and unless he can prove his innocence he will be lynched.

Car Works Damaged by Fire.

The Terre Haute Car and Manufacturing Company's immense plant in Terre Haute, Ind., was partially destroyed by fire. Loss, $75,000; almost entirely covered by insurance. Only four of the 950 employes were at work, the plant having been closed for several weeks. The company recently made an assignment because of inability to realize on its securities, although nearly all were gilt-edged and the assets were fully three times as large as the liabilities. The works will be rebuilt.

Noted Scout Dead.

Washington special: E. H. Kirlin, late Captain in the United States Army, is dead, at the age of 64. He was chief of scouts and pontoons on Gen. Hooker's staff in the Cumberland campaign, and afterward filled the same positions on the staffs of Generals Sigel, Carl Schurz, and Howard, during the campaigns of Virginia and Tennessee, when Gen. Howard led the right wing and Sherman marched to the sea. Capt. Kirlin superintended the erection of the first movable dam built in this country, after the model of those built on the Seine below Paris.

Sunk with Her Crew.

Vigo (Spain) special: The French transport Drone has put into this port in a badly damaged condition. She reports that she was in collision with the French steamer Octeville, bound from Penarth to Marseilles, and the merchant steamer was so badly damaged that she sank, carrying five persons down with her. The Drone lowered her boats and picked up eighteen persons who were left struggling in the water as the Octeville sank.

Ohio Democrats.

The Ohio Democratic State Convention met at Cincinnati and nominated the following ticket: For Governor, Lawrence T. Neal; for Lieutenant Governor, A. W. Taylor; Supreme Judge, John W. Slater; State Treasurer, B. S. Blackburn; Attorney General, John P. Bailey.

Jack Dempsey Insane.

Jack Dempsey the Nonpareil, is at St. Joseph's Hospital in St. Paul. He is suffering from a severe mental strain. Physicians at the hospital think that the brooding over past defeats has caused his mind to become temporarily unhinged.

Murder Near Muncie.

Developments have disclosed beyond doubt that Harvey Beesucker of Farmland, Ind., found mangled on the Big Four tracks near Muncie, was murdered. Edmund Davis was arrested at his home in Farmland and is in jail under suspicion.

GREAT LOSS BY FIRE.

DISASTROUS BLAZES OCCUR IN MINNEAPOLIS.

Three Simultaneous Fires Destroy Many Big Mills and Wipe Out Over a Hundred Dwellings of Workingmen—Two Lives Reported Lost.

Over a Million in Ashes.

Minneapolis has experienced the most disastrous conflagration of its history, the loss from which will reach a million and a half dollars. Two fires, presumably the work of incendiaries, broke out within a short time of each other. The first fire broke out in a stable in the rear of the Cedar Lake Ice Company house, and soon spread to the ice-house proper. From there, fanned by a quick breeze, it spread to Clark's box factory, and then destroyed the boiler works of Lintges, Connell & Co., including a $27,000 riveting machine the only one west of Chicago. Lenhart's Union Wagon Works were totally consumed. Also a quantity of lumber belonging to various firms. The Cedar Lake Ice Company loses $5,000; Clark's Box Company, $30,000; Lintges, Connell & Co., $60,000; Union Wagon Works, $15,000. On this there is a total insurance of about half. While this fire was at its height an alarm was turned in from the lumber district at the other end of the island. Boom Island, as the place is called, was a mass of wood and timber piles belonging to Nelson Tenny & Co and Backus & Co.

This was blazing fiercely, and fanned by a brisk wind the flames soon spanned the narrow stretch of water and began eating their way among the big sawmills and residences in the vicinity of the river bank. One after another the planing-mills of the Wilcox Company, the Chatterton mill, the Backus mill, the Hove mill, Smith & Corrigan, and Nelson Tenny & Co. felt the blast of the fire and were either totally destroyed or badly damaged.

The flames left a path of blackness through Marshall street and were practically stopped by the big brick structure of the Minneapolis Brewing Co., although their loss is put at $110,000. Situated as it was, directly in the path of the flames, with wooden buildings on one side of it and a blazing lumber yard in the rear, it seemed as if this magnificent edifice costing $500,000 would be added to the long list of property destroyed. But Providence came to the aid of the exhausted firemen and frightened citizens. The wind changed. It no longer blew from the south, but sprang up from the east and north, wafting large cinders and embers across the river, jeopardizing valuable property on the north side. The citizens, however, were on the alert, and a reception in the shape of a bucket of water awaited any spark that found a lodging. All along Marshall street and through that entire section are small frame houses occupied by laboring and sawmill hands. They went like tinder when the flames first struck them, but the residents had ample time to move their belongings.

In all 112 houses were destroyed. Although a general alarm was turned in, the entire city department proved inadequate to the occasion and aid was asked from St. Paul. That city promptly responded and sent over two steamers and a hose cart that did excellent service. The fire on Boom Island was burning fiercely at a late hour at night, and the only hope seemed to lie in letting it burn itself out.

For a while it looked as though all of northeast Minneapolis would be destroyed, but by the concentration of the department the further progress of the flames was checked. There were several accidents caused by spectators attempting to run on the logs and falling in. Two lives are reported lost and a number of persons sustained serious injury.

A conservative estimate puts the total loss at $1,500,000 and the insurance at $900,000. The principal losses are as follows: E. W. Backus & Company lose 60,000,000 feet of lumber, worth $750,000, two sawmills, and barn, making their total loss about $1,000,000. J. F. Wilcox, planing mill, $50,000. J. B. Chatterton, sawmill, $15,000. Lintges, Connels & Company, boiler works, $60,000. J. R. Clark & Company, box and ladder factory, $50,000. Nelson, Tenny & Company, sawmill and lumber, $40,000. F. F. Lenhart, carriage works, $15,000. George W. Higgins, wood yard, $5,000. Cedar Lake Ice Company, ice houses, $10,000. Miscellaneous losses on dwellings, barns, etc., $75,000.

Hundreds of people are homeless and many of these are the recipients of charity, having saved only the clothes on their backs.

SUIT AGAINST BRECKINRIDGE.

Miss Pollard Seeks Heavy Damages for Alleged Breach of Promise.

In the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia suit has been filed for $50,000 for breach of promise against Representative W. C. P. Breckinridge, of Kentucky, by Madeline V. Pollard. The plaintiff charges, according to a Washington correspondent, that in April, 1884, when she was 17 years old and a student at Wesleyan Female Seminary at Cincinnati, she was met on the train traveling from school to Frankfort, Ky., by W. C. P. Breckinridge, who made her acquaintance on the plea of his knowing her family, and that she was flattered by his attentions, knowing who he was and regarding him as a very prominent man, and that on Aug. 3, 1884, he came to see her at the seminary and got permission of the president for her to dine with him, and by wiles and artifices and protestations of affection subsequently took advantage of her youth and inexperience. She avers that he got her completely under his control. The allegations filed go at great length into relations which existed between the plaintiff and Mr. Breckinridge, as she charges, until recently. The birth of two children (who died) and the premature birth of a third child are alleged as a result of this intimacy. She further alleges that after the death of the children she came to Washington, and he promised to marry her as soon as it would be proper for him to do so in a sufficient time after the death of his wife. From time to time, she alleges, the date for the marriage was postponed until on the 18th day of July she avers Mr. Breckinridge wrongfully and injuriously married another woman, Mrs. Louisa Wing, who was then a resident of the city of St. Louis. The plaintiff in the case was for some time an employe in one of the departments in Washington, but shortly after the death of Gen. Sherman was dismissed, it is said, for the making of a derogatory remark respecting the dead General. The announcement of her engagement to Mr. Breckinridge and the subsequent breaking off of that engagement and Mr. Breckinridge's marriage created a sensation in the capital.

SEVEN BURNED TO DEATH.

Many Persons Perish in a Small Chicago Hotel.

Shortly after 7 o'clock Monday morning a fire, which cost the lives of at least seven persons, started in the little Senate hotel on Madison street, near the corner of Fifth avenue, Chicago. The dead are: Mrs. Coons, Bertha Coons, aged 7, Charles Coons, aged 9, Godfrey children, and two unknown men. There were over a score of guests in the hotel. The flames spread so rapidly and the exits were so inadequate that the inmates were unable to escape. The little hotel was situated on the two upper floors of a three-story brick building. The fire started on the second floor, midway, near the stairs leading to the floor above. Mrs. Ahrens and her daughter Annie slept in room 20 in the front part of the third floor. They discovered the fire first. The other twenty occupants were flying about, seeking an avenue of escape. Annie and her mother groped their way through the stifling smoke to the window and stood out on the sill. The crowd below yelled to them not to jump. With desperation the women clung to the frame-work, keeping as far out as possible, while the smoke and flames burst through the windows around them. Although badly burned they retained their position until the arrival of hook and ladder company No. 6. A ladder was raised and they were rescued. A man whose identity is unknown next reached the window. The flames were already scorching his almost nude body and he jumped to the stone pavement. He was picked up in an unconscious condition.

When the firemen arrived ladders were raised and the work of rescuing the imperiled inmates systematically began. For some, hemmed in by flames, overpowered by smoke and with all egress shut off, the rescue was too late, however. The firemen found dead bodies rather than living ones. The bodies of six persons were recovered and several still living were carried to surrounding drug stores. Lieut. Humanson was the first to reach the third floor. The brave fireman was cheered by the crowd and climbed through a window. The bodies of the unfortunates lay near and one after the other he lifted them out.

All the patrol wagons from the South Side were summoned, and drove rapidly to the hospital with the injured. The fire is said to have started from an overturned stair-lamp. Many of those killed and injured were World's Fair visitors, and, as the hotel register was burned, it is feared the list of dead here given is not complete.

BATTLE HAS BEGUN.

IN THE HOUSE AN ORATORICAL CYCLONE OPENS.

Many Representatives Give Notice that They Intend to Deliver Speeches on the Subject of Finance—Senate Is Relieved from Hasty Action.

The Extra Session.

Washington correspondence:

The plan suggested by the anti-silver men by which to get the silver question "on" in the House has been agreed to, and the battle can be said to have begun. Congress has settled down to debate with a degree of expedition almost unknown in its history. The action of the House on the silver question relieves the Senate majority from any hasty action. The program in the House was definitely fixed by the adoption of the order introduced by Representative Bland. The time will be devoted exclusively to the consideration of the silver question under the rules of the last House governing general debate.

Notwithstanding the apparent lack of interest in the discussion manifested by members, the number of applicants for recognition on the Speaker's list demonstrates that the period alotted to the debate—eleven days under the general rules and three days under the five-minute rule—will be all occupied. There are at the time this is written between ninety and one hundred names enrolled by the Speaker, the great majority of whom probably expect to talk the full hour allowed by the rule. There are a number, however, who have stipulated for shorter periods, generally twenty minutes or half an hour. If it appears that the time for the debate will be too short to accommodate all who wish to speak, night sessions will be held to lengthen the period.

Rules for the House.

Since the House entered upon the discussion of the silver question, under an order which will not exhaust itself until the close of next week, the probability that the organization of the House by the adoption of rules and appointment of committees would not be completed for two or three weeks has changed into almost a certainty. One of the members of the majority of the committee, when asked about the prospects for action on the rules, said that until the present order of the House had expired there was no need of rules. It was not possible to break in upon the silver debate with one over the adoption of the rules, even were the new code ready to be reported. So, in his opinion, the committee would not be in a hurry to prepare their report. The member further remarked the probabilities were that the rules of the House in the Fifty-second Congress which had been referred to the committee for consideration would not be materially changed; in fact, he expected but few changes of any nature from the system under which the last House was directed.

Secretary Carlisle spent an hour or two with Speaker Crisp in his room at the Capitol, and they probably touched upon the subject of rules in the course of their conversation. Nothing could be more natural than that Mr. Crisp should solicit an opinion from his predecessor in the Speaker's chair, and especially from one who won such high reputation as a presiding officer as did Mr. Carlisle in that position, and any suggestions the Secretary saw fit to make would doubtless be most carefully considered by the committee. There is but one rule about which any general interest attaches—the one governing closure. The best obtainable opinion is that there will be no radical change from the rule in force in last Congress which gave the House power to end debate or prevent filibustering upon any proposition whenever the majority so desired.

Routine Proceedings.

Except the seating of Geo. F. Richardson, Democrat, from the Fifth Michigan district, over Charles E. Belknap, Republican, the House transacted no business of importance after the opening session, but adjourned until Thursday. The Senate was in session Wednesday only twenty minutes and a considerable part of that time was occupied by the Chaplain in an eloquent eulogy of the late Senator Stanford of California. The only item of business transacted was the reference to the Committee on Appropriations of the House joint resolution to provide for the payment of sessional employes of the House during the present extraordinary session.

Thursday, the only business transacted by either house was the reading of the journal. The Senate adjourned until Monday noon.

Senator Voorhees Monday introduced in the Senate his bill authorizing the issue of national bank notes to the full value of bonds deposited. It is accompanied by a letter from Secretary Carlisle recommending its passage as a measure of immediate relief, and saying it will add $19,000,000 to the circulation. Referred to the Finance Committee. The Senate passed the House joint resolution for the payment of the employes of the two houses at the present session, and also the House resolution providing for a celebration of the anniversary of the laying of the corner-stone of the Capitol. When the House met Speaker Crisp announced the following committee appointments: Enrolled Bills — Messrs. Pearson (chairman), Russell (Georgia), Latimer, Hines, Hager, Adams, and Gillett (New York). Accounts — Messrs. Rusk (chairman), Paynter, Tate, Mutchler, Ikert, Wells, Post, Wright (Massachusetts), and Marvin. Mileage — Messrs. Lynch (chairman), Strait, Pendleton (Texas), and Mahon. The silver debate was then resumed, Mr. Boatner (Dem.), of Louisiana, making the initiative speech in favor of free coinage.

AN AMERICAN IN IT.

The Great Hatton Garden Swindle, Written for This Paper.

BY J. M. BARRIE.

CHAPTER IV.

But long before the expiration of the term fixed for the completion of the setting of the diamonds, the American was back in Hatton Garden. And the visits became more frequent as the intimacy between the two Vanderstrooms grew stronger. The Colonel—he was not a general, as the Dutch Cornelius found out from inquiries he caused to be made at the American's hotel—the Colonel developed a habit of dashing up with those magnificent bays of his to the merchant's office two or three days a week, "just to see how he was getting on," and to invite him out for a bottle of "'74" and an oyster patty at the adjacent railway restaurant. On these occasions the American would allow the voluble little Dutchman to do the major portion of the talking. Somehow or other the conversation invariably took the direction, under the Colonel's dexterous steering, of London thieves and the various great robberies and swindles that had recently taken place in the metropolis. This was a subject on which the diamond merchant was quite at home, and, there being no wife in the way, he proceeded to pose with great impressiveness as an authority on the intricacies of "put-up yobs;" the great bank haul of £11,000; and how all these affairs were worked on the conjurer's principle of "de quickness of de hand dat deceives de eye."

Once, after the opening of a second bottle, when Cornelius the lesser had grown extra communicative, he imparted to his kinsman the episode of the lost pocketbook, and the tenacity with which his wife had stuck to the £3,500 she had found in the hall, refusing to give it up, except on his urgent demand, for the application of the sum strictly to business purposes.

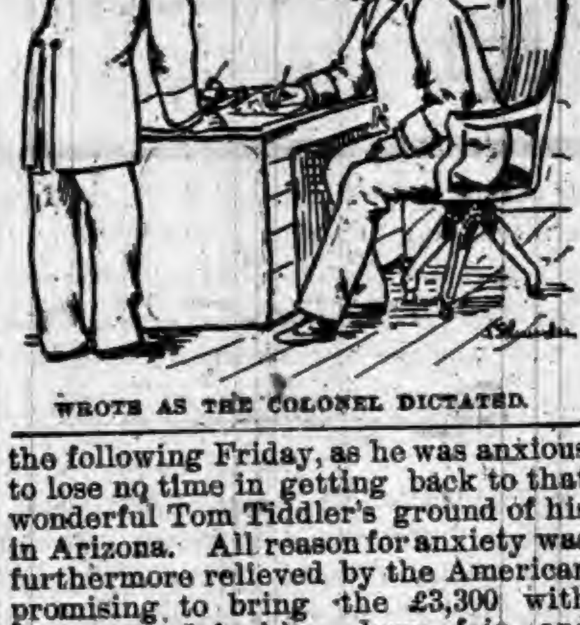
The American, who had been lolling at the bar with characteristic languor, grew suddenly interested. He stiffened himself up, listened attentively, became abstracted for a minute or two, then hastily, for such an unusually deliberate gentleman, tossed off his glass, pleaded a forgotten engagement, got into his phaeton, and was driven off by the discreet-looking groom, with whom he might afterwards have been noticed in earnest conversation, in the direction of his hotel.

The following morning the Yankee Vanderstroom was again in Hatton Garden, and almost as soon as the other Cornelius had arrived at business.

More news; wonderful wire from Pot-shot Gulch! "Blarmed," if he didn't think the mine was "going to turn out a second 'Tombstone.'" They were "ladling it out" of two more reefs, and the wife must have more diamonds. Better finish her off once for all, while he was about it, with a necklace and stars. Those, with what he had already ordered, "ought," he declared, "to make her shine like the figurehead of Liberty at the entrance to New York harbor."

This time stones to the value of £2,000 were selected, and another hundred-pound note was handed over, just as the American put it, "by way of cover for the fixings."

The diamond merchant was perfectly satisfied; and, at his friend's urgent "solicitation," promised to "hurry up" and have the entire suite complete that day three weeks, so that the silver king could catch the American mail on the following Friday, as he was anxious to lose no time in getting back to that wonderful Tom Tiddler's ground of his in Arizona. All reason for anxiety was furthermore relieved by the American promising to bring the £3,300 with him, and "planking down fair and square," before the jewels were handed over to him.



WROTE AS THE COLONEL DICTATED.

At last the eventful day arrived when the setting was finished and the magnificent suite of jewels were ready in their great velvet-lined case for delivery.

The Colonel was punctuality itself. He was driven up to the office, as usual, by that eminently respectable groom of his, and he came in smoking a great green cigar, as cool and collectedly as ever.

The suite was pronounced superb. It surpassed the Colonel's expectations.

Would Vanderstroom the lesser mind putting the diamonds back in their case and handing them to his man below while he, the Colonel, counted out the notes?

The merchant was about to do as he was bid when his habitual caution got the better of him. He kept a firm hold on the case, and didn't budge an inch.

The Colonel evidently didn't see his hesitation. He was feeling, as well as he could with his one hand, in his pockets, and seemed rather disconcerted at not finding what he was searching for.

Would his namesake mind, "just going over him?" He was so helpless with his one hand.

There was no pocket-book to be found.

After a moment's reflection, the Colonel slapped his leg, laughed, and said he had it. He remembered now his wife took his bill case out of his pocket at the hotel that morning to get some money to pay for some frocks.

"Guess she forgot to put it back. It's a way they've got, eh, Colonel?" laughingly ejaculated the American.

The Colonel's open, hearty manner reassured the little diamond merchant, who was growing just a little—the merest shade of a trifle—suspicious.

The sharp eyes of the Colonel noticed it at once.

"We'll soon fix that up," he said, with his usual calm drawl. "I'll stop right here and get the money all the same—every cent of it. But I must ask you to act as my secretary. My left fist ain't no good nohow with a pen. Here, any paper will do. Take this memo. form of yours and scribble a few lines for me. My wife knows I came right here, and your bill-head will recall the business and why I want the dollars."

Nothing unreasonable in that. Little Vanderstroom had penciled memorandums for his maimed namesake several times before. He sat down and wrote to the Colonel's dictation:

> MY DEAR WIFE—Send me by bearer the pocket-book you have of mine, with its contents. I require it for immediate and important payment. Don't keep the messenger waiting. Make him give you a receipt for it. Your affectionate husband,
> CORNELIUS VANDERSTROOM.

"Bully for you," cried the American, when the Dutchman had written, signed and sealed the letter. "Now, then you just run down and give it to my man. Tell him to drive to the hotel, get his answer from my wife, and he'll be back with the dollars before we've time to finish a cigar."

The diamond merchant executed this commission with such alacrity and dispatch that he was back in the office almost before the Colonel had taken a second puff at a fresh Villar y Villar.

The American held the closed jewel-case in his hand.

"Lock it up," he cried, jestingly, "or I might be tempted to run away with it!"

The little Dutchman hardly relished that form of joking. He opened his safe with surprising promptitude, and the Colonel himself placed the case within its fastness. The merchant turned the key and returned it to his pocket.

They sat down and smoked. Time passed and it grew dusk. The Colonel became fidgety. Vanderstroom was also getting restless. It was time for him to be getting home to dinner.

After they had sat thus for more than an hour the Colonel rose from his chair and put his watch to his ear—it must have stopped? No, it was going; £3,300 was a large sum to intrust a servant with. He wished he had gone to the hotel for the money, himself; but—pshaw! nonsense, he'd trusted the man with larger sums before. His wife had gone out, and the groom was waiting for her—yes, no doubt, that was what it was. Six o'clock, and nearly dark now! An hour past closing time!

The Colonel no longer disguised his anxiety. Something unusual must have happened. He would return to his hotel at once. His wife must have got home by that time. Would Vanderstroom come with him? Or—how silly he was—to-morrow morning would do equally well. Even if his man had gone wrong, he could easily get fresh notes and be in Hatton Garden with them by 10.

The diamond merchant was really more anxious about his dinner than anything else. Reflection had shown him that there was no cause for anxiety on his part. The jewels were locked up in the safe and he had £200 as cover for the setting.

Therefore, as far as he was concerned, the payment might just as well be concluded on the morrow as that night.

CHAPTER V.

They left each other after one or two refreshers at their favorite restaurant with the appointment standing for 10 next morning. It was not kept by either party. The Colonel called a hansom, and as he waved his one hand to him it was the last glimpse the little Dutchman ever had of his military Yankee relative, with his distinguished bearing and his sleeveless coat.

When the little merchant reached his suburban home that night it was late, for he had met a friend and dined with him at his club.

Mrs. Vanderstroom was dosing in a chair before the fire.

"My lofe," began her husband, apologetically.

"I know," she answered sleepily, "I suppose you wanted it in business, or you wouldn't have broken your word."

"Broken my vord—vat vord?" cried Vanderstroom in amazement.

"Why, your word that you would never touch that 3,500 pounds unless urgent——"

"Vere is de dree tousend five hundret pounds!" shrieked Cornelius, with horrible foreboding. "Speak—who has got it?"

"Why, who should have it but you? Did you not send a man here with this order? And, of course, I gave the pocket-book up to him at once."

"Got in Himmel!" ejaculated the unfortunate merchant, as his eyes caught sight of the memorandum paper he had written at the dictation of the American, requesting the immediate return of his pocketbook, and signed—actually signed—Cornelius Vanderstroom; his own misguided autograph.

"Done by ——!" he shouted, as the whole swindle flashed upon him. Then he rushed to the stables, had a horse put to his carriage at once, and made his man drive at top speed back to town.

It was past 1 in the morning when he reached the American's hotel. The bird had flown. With a horrible suspicion that he had not yet realized the worst, he next drove to the office in Hatton Garden. With trembling hands he unlocked the great safe and opened the jewel case. It was empty. In place of the diamonds there was only a slip of paper; and Cornelius Vanderstroom—the cute, the clever, the infallible detector of a "put-up yob," fell fainting on the floor as he read his own oft-quoted maxim:

"It's the quickness of the hand deceives the eye."

* * * * * * * *

They never caught the Colonel or his wife, or that highly respectable confederate, the groom. The Scotland Yard detectives were of the opinion that the affair was the handiwork of a certain "Flash Cassady," a cockney cracksman of phenomenal ingenuity and of cosmopolitan accomplishments, who had impersonated a Yankee with considerable success before. Whether this was so or not, he disappeared, as Cornelius had to do when the robbery got wind, and the little Dutchman became the wholesale recipient of that form of common or "Garden" chaff for which the great diamond market is so justly celebrated. The notes and the diamonds were never recovered. The former, after a decent interval, found their way into the "innocent holder's hands;" while the latter, when taken out of the setting, might have been easily disposed of on the Continent. Thus the great Hatton Garden robbery lives now only in the archives of the police as the most successful and cutest "single-handed" swindle of the century.

DEATH IN THE STORM.

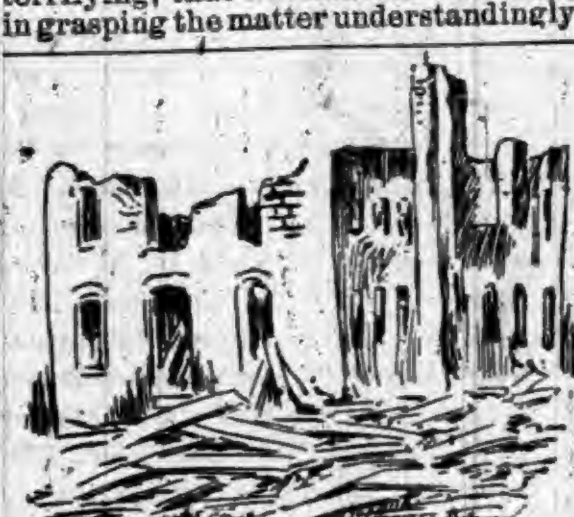
HOW WHIRLING TORNADOES CARRY DESTRUCTION.

Manner in Which They Are Generated—Phenomena that Are Mysterious—No Building Is Safe from Them—Seeking Refuge in Cyclone Caves.

Black Funnel Clouds.

TORNADOES (what people in the West call "cyclones") have been cutting up strange freaks lately. But that is a way they have, says the Washington Star. Science has for a long time been very anxious to discover reasons for the vagaries of these wonderful storms, but as yet the laws controlling them remain to a great extent unknown. They have come to be recognized as among the most destructive of natural phenomena, so that many insurance companies are making it a part of their business to underwrite property against them. It has been estimated that, taking an average, each tornado costs one life.

No subject in the science of meteorology is of such absorbing interest as that of tornadoes. Their performances are so amazing, and the manifestations by which they are accompanied are so terrifying, that the mind has difficulty in grasping the matter understandingly.

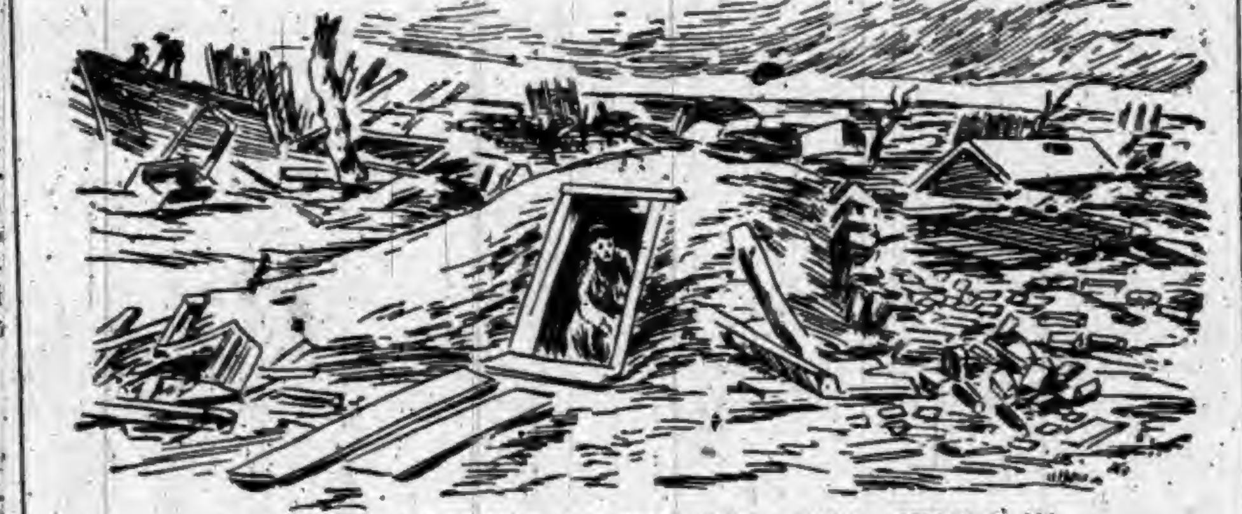


AFTER THE CYCLONE.

As a rule, they give fair warning of their approach. The air is usually very still and sultry. People feel depressed without knowing why. Dark and threatening clouds appear on the western horizon, and the sky from west to south takes on a peculiar lurid or greenish tinge. This "tornado sky" is a characteristic feature.

The Funnel-Shaped Cloud.

From the suspended masses of vapor a sort of tail is seen to project itself downward. It gradually assumes, while approaching, the aspect of a gigantic funnel, with the small end toward the ground. This funnel moves with enormous rapidity, its speed being rarely under forty miles an hour. As it comes nearer, an indescribable roar is heard, which has been likened to the bellowing of a million mad bulls or the rumbling of 10,000 trains of cars over as many bridges.



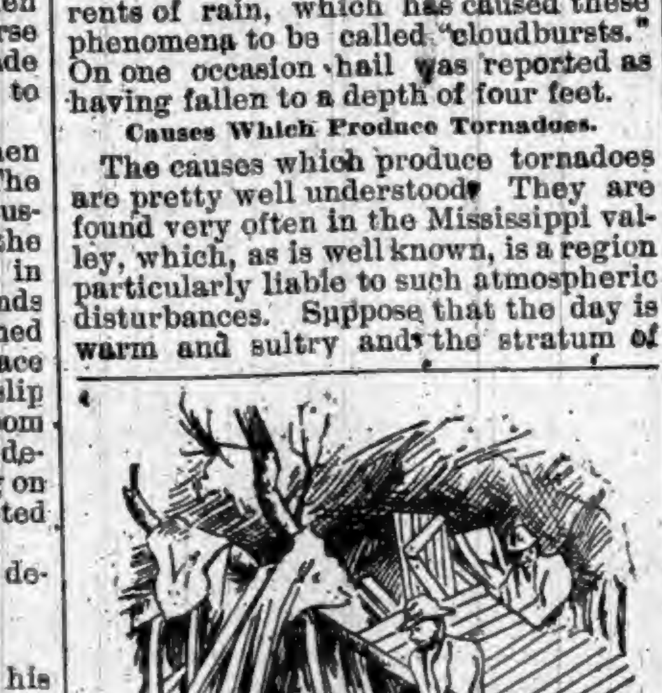
AFTER THE CYCLONE AT POMEROY, IOWA, JULY 6, '93.

Still the great cloud advances, black as night, somewhat resembling an immense balloon, sweeping its neck round and round with terrible fury and destroying everything in its path. It whirls with almost incredible velocity, sometimes leaving the earth for a moment, then bounding back to continue its dire havoc. The whole period of destruction may occupy only three or four minutes, but in that time towns are wiped out and fields are laid waste. A few minutes later the blue sky appears, the wind turns to the south, and all quiets down. No one would suppose that a terrible catastrophe had occurred, save for the devastation that is all about and the cries of the unfortunates.

It often happens that the funnel-shaped monster is preceded by a great cloud of dust, produced by an outrush of air before the storm, so that the approaching danger is not seen until it is immediately at hand. The mighty balloon of vapor travels twice as fast as the tempest out of which it is engendered. It is frequently accompanied by a vivid display of lightning. The width of the destructive path is rarely over 300 feet. In the central line all trees are strewn in the same direction, as though a mighty river had passed and left them behind. Just after the tornado usually come torrents of rain, which has caused these phenomena to be called "cloudbursts." On one occasion hail was reported as having fallen to a depth of four feet.

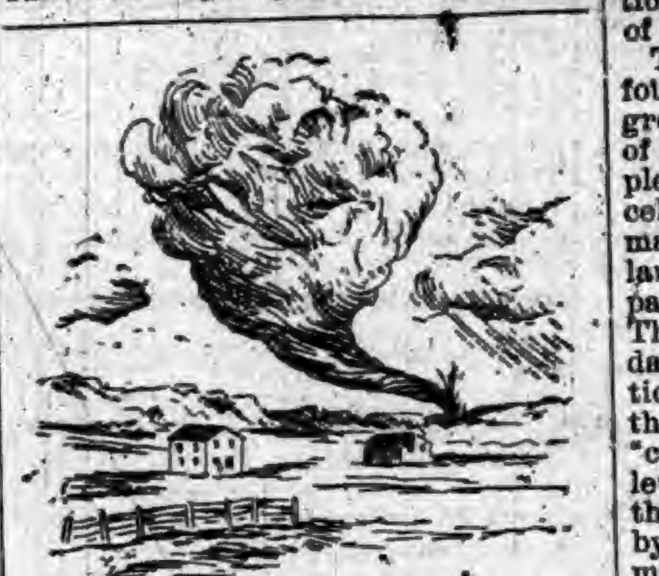
Causes Which Produce Tornadoes.

The causes which produce tornadoes are pretty well understood. They are found very often in the Mississippi valley, which, as is well known, is a region particularly liable to such atmospheric disturbances. Suppose that the day is warm and sultry and the stratum of heated air near the earth is full of vapor. A current of cold air flows in above. There you have a situation which is calculated to make trouble. The cold air being much heavier than the warm, the natural place for it to occupy is the bottom layer, with the warm stratum on top of it. So there is a tendency for the two to change places. A meteorological squabble ensues, which produces what is called a storm.



IN THE PATH OF A TORNADO.

Presently the cold layer of air aloft finds a place in the warm layer below it, through which it can make its way downward. It does so, and the performance is exhibited to the eye of the observer by the appearance of a descending funnel of vapor. It whirls around in obedience to the same law which causes a stream of water pouring through a hole in the bottom of a bowl to revolve. Incidentally an enormous energy is developed. The balloon of vapor goes sweeping along with a tremendous roar and an accompanying electrical display. It is nothing more nor less than a highly exaggerated thunder storm. Thunder storms are brought about in exactly the same way, save that the cold stratum above and the warm stratum below are mingled more gradually, producing less violent symptoms and forming no whirling funnel.



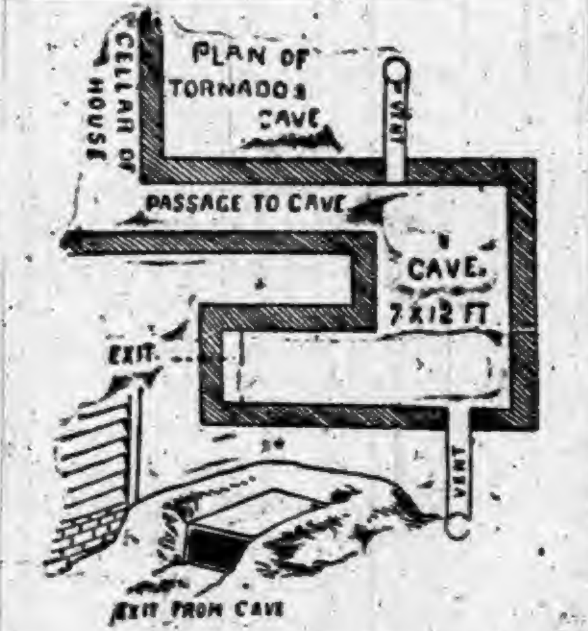
BALLOON CLOUD AT NORTH VERNON, IND., JUNE 10, 1893.

The tornado is precisely the same thing as a water spout at sea. Water spouts have often been dissipated by the firing of cannon, and it has been suggested that explosions of dynamite might produce the same effect on the terrestrial phenomenon. The difficulty would be to get near enough, and nobody who could run away would care to stand his ground and for scientific purposes experiment with explosives on the susceptibility of a "cyclone." Data respecting tornadoes are unsatisfactory, because those who have an opportunity to observe them are in such fear of their lives that their accounts are not apt to be reliable. No photograph of one of these whirling funnel clouds has ever been secured, though many bogus ones have been manufactured for sale. However, now that the kodak fiend, whom nothing can terrify, is abroad in the land, it may be expected that sooner or later some snap shots will be obtained.

Tricks Tried with Storms.

Men have stood within 150 feet of tornadoes on the north side, which is the safe side, without being injured. All sorts of foolish tricks have been tried with these storms. A Kansas man tried to drive across the path of one with a team and wagon, thinking that he could get over in time and being in a hurry to deliver some lumber. The consequence was that he and the horses were killed and badly mangled, the cart being reduced to a wreck and the lumber scattered over several square miles of territory in the shape of kindling wood. People have actually refused to run away from a tornado with similar consequences. Others have made the mistake of running in front of it, thinking to outstrip it in the race. But it is a fact that anybody who has once encountered a "cyclone" is always more than ready afterward to promptly "hunt his hole."

It is not possible to determine with accuracy the path of a tornado until it is too near to be comfortable, save that its track is always southwest to northeast. The question as to which way to run may have to be decided on the instant. Supposing the danger imminent the proper way to do is to run either north or south, but never to the east or northeast, because that is the direction in which the storm is moving.



SAFETY ONLY UNDER GROUND.

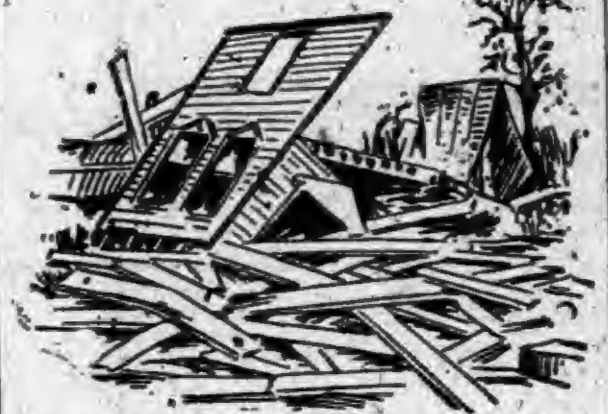
If it is only a mile away and coming directly toward the observer the latter has just about one minute to get out of the way. If he does not start wrong the chances are that he will escape. If in doubt strike for the north, for, as has been said, that is the safe side of a tornado.

Happily, in the east such phenomena are comparatively infrequent, but there is not a State between the 100th meridian and the Atlantic ocean in which they do not occur. Accordingly, nobody can be sure that he may not at some time have to tackle a tornado, and these rules, if not worth pasting in one's hat, should be at least remembered. As for seeking shelter from such a danger in a building, there is no safety in that. Experts in such matters declare that no structure can be raised by man above the surface of the earth which will resist the violence of this sort of storm. Not ever so massive a pile as the treasury building could withstand a first-class tornado. In the great "cyclone" at Grinnell, Iowa, a few years ago, which destroyed many lives and a vast amount of property, one of the buildings reduced to complete ruin was a solid edifice of stone and brick used for a public school. The tornado tore it to pieces as easily as if it had been so much lath and plaster.

On the contrary, a building of brick or stone is a more unsafe refuge from a tornado than a frame dwelling, because, if destroyed, it tumbles in and buries people in the ruins. When the famous "cyclone" of 1890 struck Louisville forty-four persons were killed in the wreck of Falls City Hall. That storm wiped out seventy-six lives and $2,250,000 worth of property in Louisville, and in other towns fifty-nine lives and $1,000,000 in property. The whirling cloud, which was described as shaped like a turnip, struck Louisville at about 7:45 in the evening. The noise it made was compared to the passage of a heavy train of cars over a bridge a thousand times intensified. All the gas jets in the city either went out or were nearly extinguished, and the crash of falling buildings added to the appalling rumpus, while a terrific electric display served as an accompaniment, balls of fire playing about. Apparently the lower end of the funnel did not touch the ground, the destruction being confined to the upper stories of the houses.

The only place where safety can be found against a tornado is under ground. In the region where storms of this type are frequent prudent people construct what they call "cyclone cellars." This is usually an excavation made through the west wall of the cellar of the house outward, so that no part of it is beneath the dwelling. The west side is chosen because the danger always comes from that direction, and, if the house is demolished, the ruins will be thrown away from the "cave." The floor of the latter is made level with the floor of the cellar, and the earth roof of the cave is supported by heavy timbers and arched with masonry of brick or stone. These are precautions against damage by the falling of heavy masses of debris. Sometimes a cave is dug apart from the house, but close by it, on the west side. It is made big enough to accommodate all the inmates of the dwelling.

Such a resort is a means of absolute safety. Fortunately, as has been said, the approach of a tornado is advertised in advance by unmistakable premonitory symptoms. The householder has simply to convey his family to the "cyclone cellar," close the entrance by a strong door provided for the purpose and await the passing of the danger. If a person finds himself in the path of the whirling monster and has no refuge the best thing for him to do is to throw himself face downward, with his head to the east and his arms over his head to protect it. If near a large stone or stump he should lie down with his head toward the object, embracing it. If compelled to remain in a building he should go to the west room on the ground floor and stand in the center of it. It often happens that half of a house is torn away, the other half remaining uninjured. By seeking the west side one is more likely to escape being struck by debris.



RUINS OF GRINNELL'S HOUSE, JUNE 17, 1882.

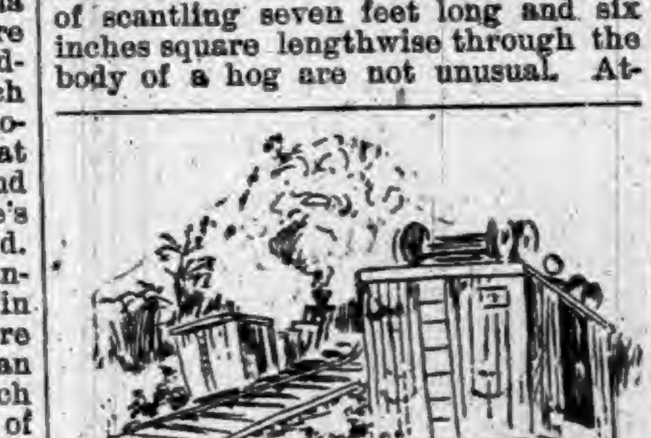
A tornado struck the town of Morgan, Ohio, June 19, 1823. At 9:30 p. m. a householder, whose account is quoted, heard a roaring as of heavy thunder, which called him to the door. On opening it he immediately discovered a bright cloud, which had precisely the color of a glowing oven, apparently the size of a half acre of ground, moving rapidly in the direction of his dwelling. The brightness of the cloud illuminated everything about. There was no lightning nor rain, but a continual and tremendous roar during the passage of the storm. The roaring of a tornado has been described as a continual woo-oo-oo and whir-r-r-r.

Points in Dispute.

There are many points about the tornado which are in dispute among meteorologists. Some of them are of the opinion that there is a partial vacuum in the middle of the whirling balloon cloud, and many witnesses speak of the manner in which the huge funnel sucks up everything in its path. It is stated that the sucking sound is very distinctly heard as the monster rushes across the country. It certainly does take up water from streams, and one instance is recorded where a tornado completely emptied a well forty feet deep. Other authorities aver that in the midst of the revolving funnel there is a plenum, the reverse of a vacuum.

Some of the doings perpetrated by tornadoes are most astonishing. At Wallingford, Conn., Aug. 9, 1878, a storm of this sort blew stone monuments off their bases. It was estimated that the velocity of whirl required to accomplish this was 260 miles an hour. Children have frequently been lifted hundreds of feet into the air and laid down unhurt. It has been observed that objects uplifted by this agency do not drop with the ordinary force of falling bodies in many instances. A whirling cloud at Pine Plains, N. Y., June 19, 1835, caught a man on a road with a team and wagon carrying a hogshead of sugar. The hogshead and contents weighed 1,250 pounds. It, together with the horses and cart, was hurled over a stone wall. The man was blown in the opposite direction a distance of fifteen rods. Light objects are sometimes transported a distance of twenty miles. In one instance a horse was carried half a mile and put down uninjured.

People who are struck by tornadoes are commonly stripped entirely of their clothing, particularly women. In one recorded instance the trimming was taken off a dress as neatly as if it had been done by hand. Persons who meet with such a misfortune are apt to be covered with mud, plentiful quantities of which seem ordinarily to be carried by the cyclone. The hair of women is torn from their heads and twisted into ropes sometimes. On one occasion a carpet, which had been securely tacked to a floor, was taken up and carried out of the house without being torn. Such freaks as the driving of a piece of scantling seven feet long and six inches square lengthwise through the body of a hog are not unusual. Attempts have been made to refer the phenomena of tornadoes to spots on the sun, but it is not likely that any connection exists.



BLOWN FROM THE TRACK.

So Say We All.

Alphonse Karr, the gardener-poet, was present at a banquet given by the followers of Hahnemann, the founder of homoeopathy.

Toasts were given to the health of one medical celebrity after another by different members of the company, till at last the president remarked:

"Monsieur Karr, you have not proposed the health of any one."

The poet rose and replied modestly, "I propose the health of the sick."

The Fort Wayne Mercantile Accident Association.

For the information of our many readers who are members of the above association (and those who are not should be) we reproduce the following clippings from the Fort Wayne Gazette and Garrett Clipper:

THE VERY BEST.

Mr. Harry J. Meyer, jr., the well known hatter, who met with an accident on August 2d, was fortunately a member of the Fort Wayne Mercantile Accident association of this city. His claim was presented Friday and the amount, $25, was paid him on Saturday, just ten days after the injury. This prompt work is making the home association popular.—Fort Wayne Gazette.

QUICK WORK IN ADJUSTING CLAIMS.

Dr. Fred. B. Wood, of this city, while attending his horse on July 11th, received an injury which resulted in breaking a rib on his left side. The doctor was fortunate enough to have a policy in the Fort Wayne Mercantile Accident association which pays for all loss of time. Dr. Wood was disabled two weeks, sending in his proofs of disability July 27th and on the 31st he received a check for $50, paying him at the rate of $25 per week. This discounts all other companies for quick work and it has cost its members but $3 for the past seven months. Insure in the Mercantile—it is the best and cheapest.—Garrett Clipper.

A GRAND, COLOSSAL, IMPOSING SPECTACLE.

SOLOMON, HIS TEMPLE AND THE QUEEN OF SHEBA.

Presented by John Robinson's Great World's Exposition.

To the skeptic or the agnostic, as well as to the devout believer in the sacred Scriptures, the era of the great King Solomon's reign is and can be naught but the most impressive, the most interesting and the grandest in all history. There are no parallels in all the records of the past; nothing approximating in grandeur, in wisdom and Sublimity, in any chronicle of modern ages. It was, then, a felicitous conception of the management of John Robinson's Great World's Exposition to reproduce the scenes, personages, incidents and events of the reign of Solomon, the grand old patriarch, sage and King. That they have done this thoroughly, acceptably and successfully, the public and the press, everywhere the Robinson show has exhibited this season, unanimously attest. Their great biblical spectacle, in its powerful sceneographic effects, in its accurate and realistic personations, and the sumptuous lavishness attending its representation, is pronounced with universal accord to be not only a triumph in art, but a revelation in the history of the past that has never had a precedent. Our citizens will have the opportunity of seeing this grand spectacle in connection with the manifold other wonders of the John Robinson show on Friday, August 25, in Auburn.

THE AUBURN COURIER

OFFICIAL PAPER OF DeKALB COUNTY.

JAMES A. BARNS, Editor.

Registered at the Auburn, Indiana, post-office as second-class matter.

THURSDAY.........AUGUST 17, 1893.

CONGRESS is preparing bills and talking.

LEAD reached, Aug. 4, the lowest price in forty-five years.

BUILDINGS on the fair ground at Wabash burned last week.

EXCHANGE on New York is at a discount in Ft. Wayne banks.

LAWRENCE T. NEAL was nominated last week by the Ohio democrats to run for governor against McKinley.

MONEY reported easier and getting more abundant. More money is being issued to national banks and more silver sent out by the government.

A BUG is reported in some parts of country that attacks and kills potato bugs. Head him this way. We have a long felt want for him to fill.

CONTRACT to supply U. S. with postal cards for the coming four years has been let at a price $280,000 less than the last contract. Democrats are better financiers than republicans.

SOUTH BEND Times and the Tribune of the same place have been each sued for $5,000 by a barber there. They had published an item about a man getting his face poisoned by using a face lotion at that shop.

THE COURIER, as usual, "scooped', nearly all the papers of this county last week. We had the president's message, while the slower papers will get it to their readers a week later. Moral—Subscribe for the COURIER.

MRS. SARAH T. BOLTON, the lady so long at the head of Indiana poets, died at her home in Indianapolis last week, at the age of 81. She was the Author of "Paddle Your Canoe," the "Union Forever," and many other fine poems.

PROF. GORBY, who has disgraced the state and the democratic party by getting drunk, has been fined again. If the courts desire to have people satisfied with their work, they will take the trouble to throw "Prof" Gorby out of office.

THE Dispatch says republican papers are offering premiums for democratic banners. The human heart naturally craves banners and as they are ashamed of their own, they gladly take a democratic banner. This is an encouraging sign of a quickening conscience.

DEMOCRATS last year carried banners, telling the people that wheat would rise under democratic times. This is now a thorn in republican editors' sides. Of course the banners refered to the better times we hoped for as soon as democrats can make the proper changes. So far we are still under republican laws.

AT a prize fight in Denver, Colo., last week one of the two sluggers was killed. Let the good work go on. If this should happen regularly at each of their brutal exhibitions the world would be better for it. A death rate of 50 per cent in such a profession would seem pretty slow to decent people, but it would work them off in time.

TARIFF revision is more important than the repeal of the Sherman act, and more important than any legislation as to silver. Our very unwise course on the tariffs, kept up for many years, has so complicated and weakened our business interests that the wonder is that hard times did not come sooner. Congress should know it has no right to levy a duty for any other purpose than for revenue. It must stop tinkering with private business.

SEVERAL millions were paid out in Indiana to pensioners last week, so it is reported that Mr. Ensley has said. This ought to help a little to relieve hard times, and no doubt it will. That is a good feature that few seem to think of—vast sums of money are sent out among the people, all of which goes at once into circulation. The people pay a vast sum of money yearly in direct and indirect taxes, but in no case does it come back among them so generally and evenly as in pensions.

INDIANA white caps have been a disgrace to the state, causing trouble often, when there was no need of it. Last week about fifty of them went in the dead of the night to mob two men named Conrad, in Harrison county. They claimed the Conrads had killed their father, though the boys and their mother had testified he fell on a stove. The broke into the log house of the Conrads about four o'clock in the morning, and took old Mrs. Conrad and a daughter out on the poarch, and while standing there the two Conrad boys fired on them from a patch of corn near by. Much shooting was done on each side but the Conrads were not touched. Five of the white caps were killed and several more hurt. The Conrads have gone over into Kentucky. It was a terrible affair, but we hope it may give white capping a backset.

B. & O. Half-Fare to Chicago.

The B. & O. will sell round trip tickets to Chicago for one fare Aug. 21, "Indiana Day" at the Fair. Good on all trains and to return on Aug. 30. One fare for the round trip.

ANOTHER HALF FARE.

To Chicago Aug. 22, the B. & O. will sell tickets at one fare round trip. Tickets good only on the excursion train that leaves the Junction at 2:32 a. m., but good returning on all trains to Aug. 31. Passengers will be carried direct to the world's fair grounds if desired. For further information, address or call on any B. & O. agent, or L. S. Allen, Gen. Pass. Agt., Chicago, Ill.

The Press is Not Wise.

If it were wise, it would not say some of the things it does say. It thinks "the tariff should not be tinkered" on account of the "numbers of idle workingmen awaiting the action of Congress." But here is just where the trouble is, and just where Congress should begin to undo the unwise work of its republican predecessors. Congress has been going outside of its province and trying to care for certain interests when those interests and all others should care for themselves. The fact the Press overlooks is this, that all the laws on our statute books were made by republicans and are still in force and if workingmen are waiting, it is to have a democratic congress repeal them.

* * *

Again, it says that "Secretary Herbert is at a summer resort and Uncle Sam pays the bills." Are we to infer from this that the Press believes that Uncle Sam pays Herbert's board and railroad fare? All the members of the cabinet have been absent, spending their salaries as they had a right to. And Harrison's cabinet did the same thing every summer and sometimes oftener, but we do not remember that the Press noticed it.

As to Taking Away Pensions.

Some of the speakers at the G. A. R. meeting at the fair ground last Saturday evidently forgot that it was a meeting of both democratic and republican ex-soldiers whose only object in coming together was to make arrangements for attending the national encampment. They evidently thought it was a meeting to make republican converts by means of pensions. An ex-soldier informed us that one of the speakers so far forgot the proprieties of the occasion as to inform these old soldiers that he "voted as he shot," whatever that may mean. What had voting, or any sort of politics to do with that meeting? One of the speakers took pains to launch out into abuse of the democratic administration for taking away pensions. But he did not care to tell that the ruling under which at least a part of these cases comes was made by a republican pension commissioner or assistant secretary of the interior. He forgot to tell his hearers that the pensions taken away were such as were unlawful. For the sake of political effect, he was in substance telling his hearers that it was right to break a law, and wrong to obey it. Then there was a call for those to stand up who had had their pensions taken away. The first to rise was Wm. Oiler, a veteran of the Mexican war and of the rebellion. No one claims but he had a right to one pension. But it seems he has no right under the law to two pensions, one for each war. But we are told he had been drawing two, and that now his pension is all stopped for a time till his right one makes up for all he has taken contrary to law. This will take about two years, and then he will get his pension in spite of his wrong doing. Do republican politicians ask a democratic administration to do an act that is contrary to a plain law? There was another veteran that stood up, but we have not learned what was the trouble with his pension. But we venture to say that no soldier who is entitled by existing laws to a pension will be deprived of it under this or any other administration. No one wants to deprive them of it. But there are always politicians who want to get their votes for this side or that. Old soldiers cannot afford to leave their case in the hands of one political party only, and make enemies of the other. Their pensions have been given by the votes of both parties in Congress, democrats voting as freely as republicans for our pension laws. Soldiers are intelligent enough to know this, and hence to value the advice of politicians at about its true figure.

Democratic Talk.

A recent number of the Kendallville News says:

Among the many persons present at Ashley on Friday evening were Mr. Ab Kelly of Waterloo, Mr. Herm Frigang of Angola, and Mr. Stoy of Butler, who expressed themselves as very apprehensive of democratic unity and success, owing to the very bad management in politics of our present member of Congress.

The men named are sterling democrats and to a great extent express the feeling all over DeKalb county. But we do not take so gloomy a view of democratic prospects It is true that we have fallen into the hands of unworthy leaders, temporarily, but not for always. We have faith in the party and believe it will right itself and set down on the very small men who are trying to lead it to its destruction. The democratic party is greater than any one of its members; especially is it greater than any one of its unworthy members. When the time comes, the grand old party will "thoroughly purge its floor. It will gather the wheat into its garners; but will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire." The democratic party was not made to be kept under the shadow of small men or their smaller satellites.

Court.

The case of Lysher vs Eunice Zeigler and Lyman Lockwood was settled by defendants paying $25.

Several judgments were entered up against the Monitor Co., amounting in all to several thousands.

The case between Wm. Swartz and Norris Williamson on surety of peace, the latter gave $100 bond to keep the peace, but the case is appealed to the supreme court. This case shows how even two good fellows may get into trouble. They disagreed about some matter, quarreled, and went to court. A justice had the first trial, then the circuit court, and now the total costs are $146.90, say nothing of lawyers' fees and lost time.

The case of the Manuel estate vs. B. & O., damages, is taken to the federal court.

Cora vs John H. Leonard, for divorce is dismissed.

The case between Widner about the possession of land is under advisement of Judge Powers.

The damage case of Leathers vs B. & O. is going on.

HARTER'S

The following facts are related by a newspaper correspondent:

"One day while waiting upon a busy street, I placed a coin in the center of the sidewalk and studied the people. A scoer of pedestrians passed over it. Some stepped on it. Finally a woman with a basket grabbed it and the last I saw her she was smiling.

Some may have seen it but were too select to bend in public, but I doubt if any others noticed it. As a rule everybody passes over more good things than they pick up"

The truth of the last statement is beyond contradiction, and is the result of inattention to minor matters. Just at this point is where we want to apply the story to ourselves. Our stock of merchandise enables one to save a little on each article purchased, and inasmuch as most of your needs can be supplied by us, you can readily see how the aggregate saving must be great.

The success of Mrs. Annie M. Beam of McKeesport, Penn., in the treatment of diarrhœa in her children, will undoubtedly be of interest to many mothers. She says; "I spent several weeks in Johnstown. Pa., after the great flood, on account of my husband being employed there. We had several children with us, two of whom took the diarrhœa very badly. I got some of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhœa Remedy from Rev. Mr. Chapman. It cured both of them. I knew of several cases where it was equally successful. I think it cannot be excelled and cheerfully recommend it." 25 and 50c bottles for sale by Robbins & McCord.

I purchased a bottle and received almost immediate relief. I continued to use the medicine and was entirely cured. The worst injury was a cut on the head which bled profusely for a time. Some of these boys will get killed yet.

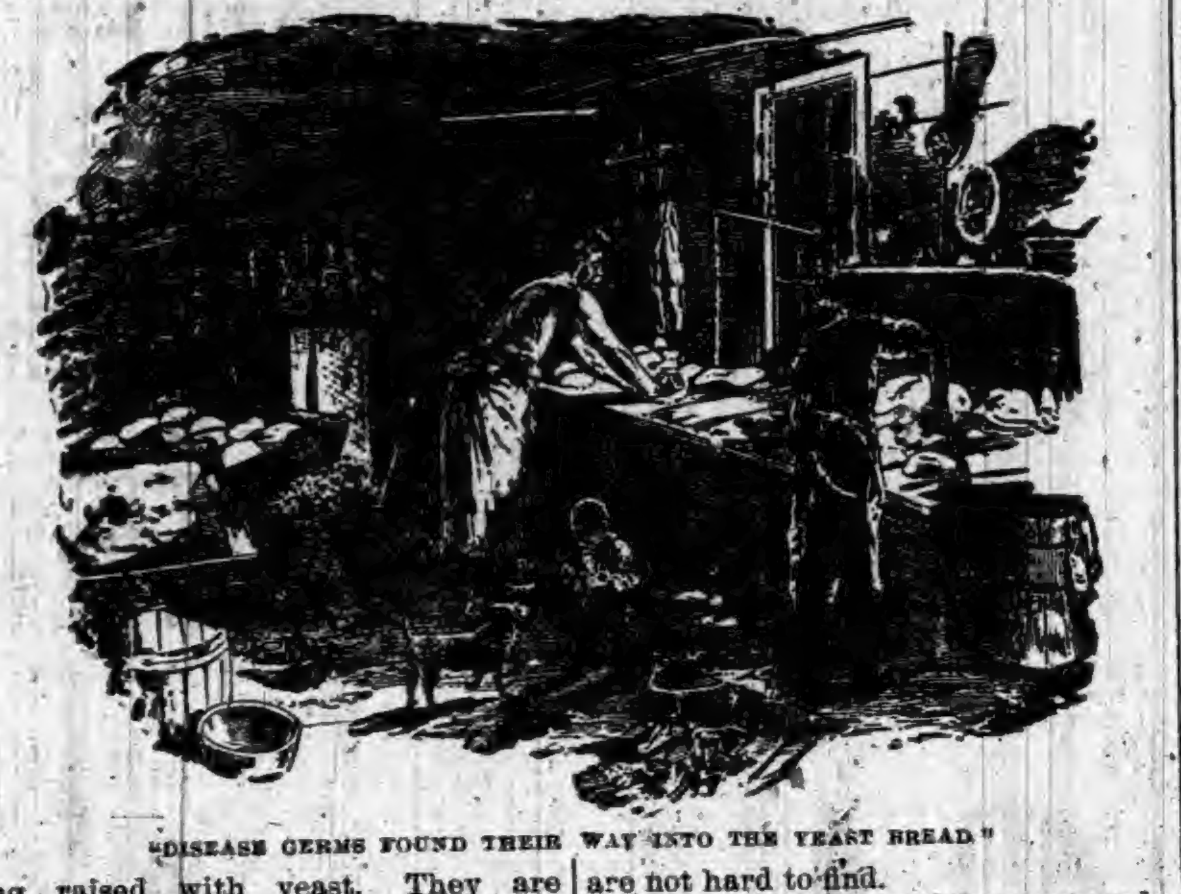
SOME SANITARY ASPECTS OF BREAD-MAKING.

BY CYRUS EDSON, M. D.
[Health Commissioner, New York City.]

It is necessary, if one would understand the sanitary aspects of bread-making, to fully comprehend the present theory held by scientists of germs and the part played by them in disease. The theory of disease germs is merely the name given to the knowledge had of those germs by medical men, a knowledge which is the result of innumerable experiments. Being this, the old term of a "theory" has become a misnomer. A germ of a disease is a plant so small that I do not know how to express intelligibly to the general reader its lack of size. When this germ is introduced into the blood or tissues of the body, its action appears to be analagous to that which takes place when yeast is added to dough. It attacks certain elements of the blood or tissues, and destroys them, at the same time producing new substances.

But the germs of the greater part of the germ diseases, that is, of the infectious and contagious diseases, will develop or increase in number without being in the body of a human being, provided always you give them the proper conditions. These conditions are to be found in dough which is being raised with yeast. They are warmth, moisture and the organic matter of the flour on which the germs, after certain changes, feed.



"DISEASE GERMS FOUND THEIR WAY INTO THE YEAST BREAD."

It is necessary to remember at this point that yeast is germ growth, and when introduced into a mixture of glucose or starch, in the presence of warmth and moisture sets up a fermentation. If the mixture be a starchy dough the yeast first changes a portion of the starch into glucose and then decomposes the glucose by changing it into two new substances, viz., carbonic acid gas and alcohol.

Now the gluten, which is also a constituent of dough and moist starch, affords, with the latter, an excellent nidus for the development of germs of disease as well as for the yeast germs. The germs of cholera, as of typhoid fever, would, if introduced into dough, find very favorable conditions for their growth.

I do not wish to "pose" as an alarmist, nor am I willing to say there is very much chance of the germs of typhus and of cholera reaching the stomachs of the people who eat bread which has been raised with yeast. But I have not the slightest cause to doubt that other diseases have been and will be carried about in the bread.

I have met journeymen bakers, suffering from cutaneous diseases, working the dough in the bread trough with naked hands and arms. I have no reason to suppose bakers are less liable to cutaneous diseases than are other men, and I know, as every housewife knows, yeast-raised bread must be worked a long time. This is an exceedingly objectionable thing from the standpoint of a physician, for the reason that the germs of disease which are in the air and dust and on stairways and straps in street cars, are most often collected on the hands. Any person who has ever kneaded dough understands the way in which the dough cleans the hands. This means that any germs which may have found a lodging place on the hands of the baker before he makes up his batch of bread are sure to find their way into the dough, and once there, to find all the conditions necessary for subdivision and growth. This is equivalent to saying that we must rely on heat to kill these germs, because it is almost certain that they will be there. Now, underdone or doughy bread is a form which every man and woman has seen.

It is a belief as old as the hills that underdone bread is unhealthful. This reputation has been earned for it by the experience of countless generations, and no careful mother will wish her children to eat bread that has not been thoroughly cooked. The reason given for this recognized unhealthfulness has been that the uncooked yeast dough is very difficult to digest. No one but a physican would be apt to think of disease germs which have not been killed during the process of baking as a cause of the sickness following the use of uncooked yeast bread. Yet this result from this cause is more than probable. I have not the slightest doubt that could we trace back some of the cases of illness which we meet in our practice we would find that germs collected by the baker have found their way into the yeast bread, that the heat has not been sufficient to destroy them, that the uncooked yeast bread has been eaten and with it the colonies of germs, that they have found they way into the blood and that the call for our services which followed has rounded off this sequence of events.

I have already pointed out that the germs of disease are to be found in the air and dust. The longer any substance to be eaten is exposed to the air, the greater the chance that germs will be deposited on it. Bread raised with yeast is worked down or kneaded twice before being baked, and this process may take anywhere from four hours to ten. It has, then, the chance of collecting disease germs during this process of raising, and it has two periods of working down or kneading, during each of which it may gather the dirt containing the germs from the baker's hands. As no bread save that raised with yeast goes through this long process of raising and kneading, so no bread save that raised with yeast has so good a chance of gathering germs.

What is meant by "raising" bread is worth a few words. The introduction of the yeast into the moist dough and the addition of heat when the pan is placed near the fire produces an enormous growth of the yeast fungi—the yeast "germ," in other words. These fungi effect a destructive fermentation of a portion of the starchy matter of the flour—one of the most valuable nutrient elements in the flour. The fermentation produces carbonic acid gas, and this, having its origin in every little particle of the starch, which is itself everywhere in the flour, pushes aside the particles of the dough to give itself room. This is what is called "raising the bread."

It needs but a glance to see that it is, in its effects on the dough, purely mechanical. The dough, which was before a close-grained mass, is now full of little holes, and when cooked in this condition is what we ordinarily call light. This porous quality of the bread enables the stomach to rapidly and easily digest it, for the gastric juices quickly soak into and attack it from all sides. The fermentation of the dough, however, uses up a portion of the nutrient elements of the loaf. If it be possible, therefore, to produce a light porous loaf without this destruction and without the "kneading" process, which fills the dough with germs and filth, and without the long period during which the raising process goes on, the gain in food and the gain in the avoidance of the germs is exceedingly plain.

But while we can easily see the dangers which attend the use of yeast it is certain that the vesiculating effect produced by it on the dough is to the last degree perfect. It is apparent that if we are to substitute any other system of bread making we must have one which will give us, first, mechanical results equally as good, that is, that will produce minute bubbles of carbonic acid gas throughout the mass of dough. Now it is in no way difficult to produce carbonic acid gas chemically, but when we are working at bread we must use such chemicals as are perfectly healthful. Fortunately these are not hard to find.

The evils which attend the yeast-made bread are obviated by the use of a properly made, pure and wholesome baking powder in lieu of yeast. Baking powders are composed of an acid and an alkali, which, if properly combined, should when they unite at once destroy themselves and produce carbonic acid gas. A good baking powder does its work while the loaf is in the oven, and, having done it, disappears.

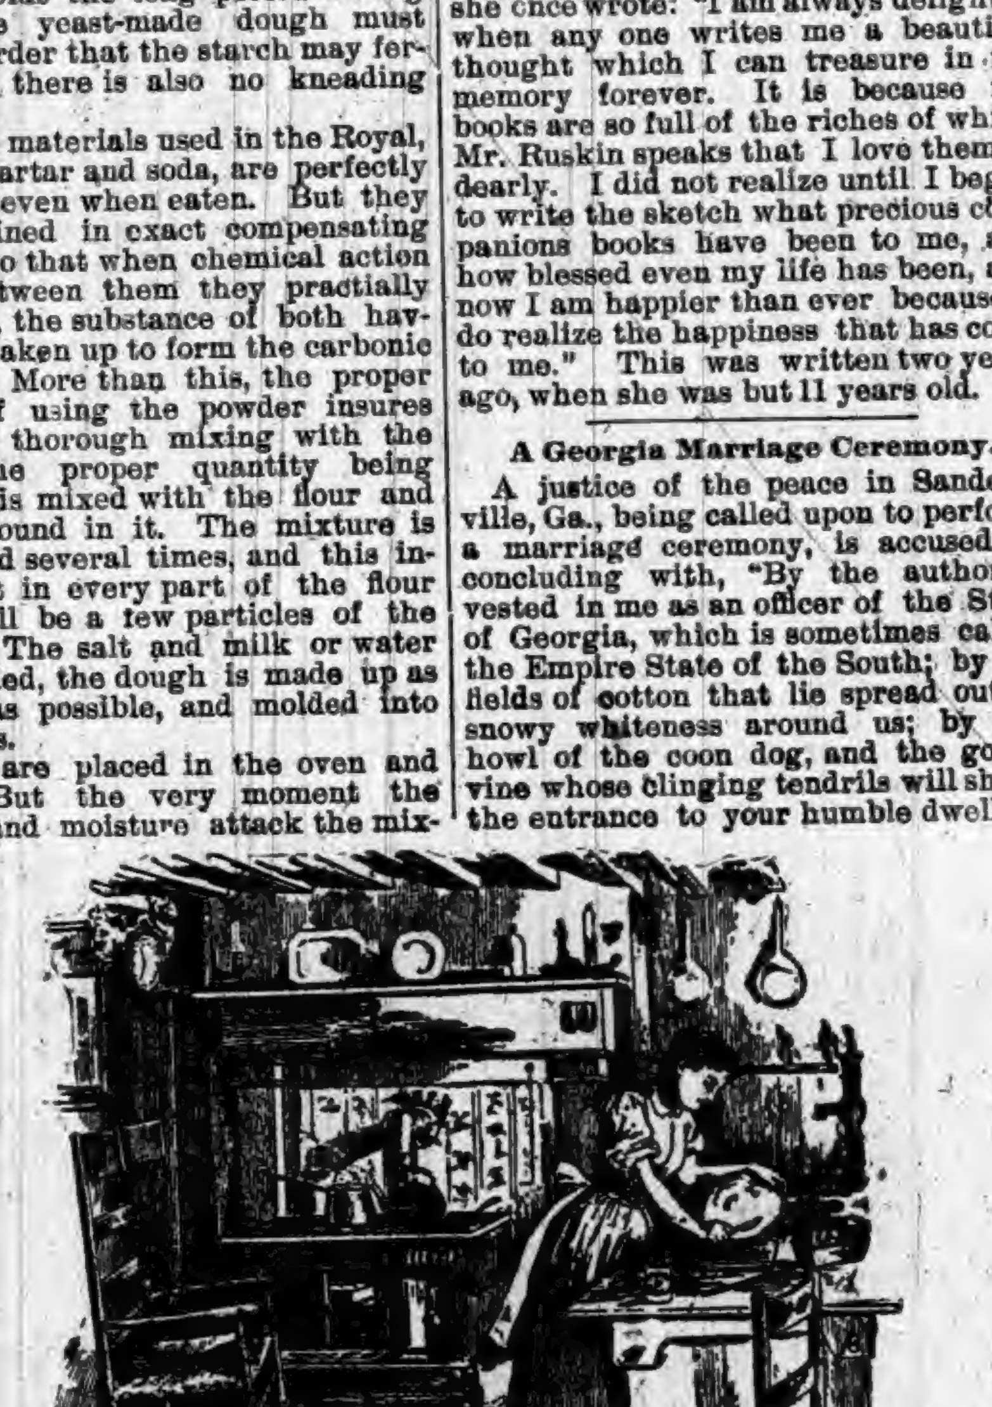
But care is imperative in selecting the brand of baking powder to be certain that it is composed of non-injurious chemicals. Powders containing alum or those which are compounded from impure ingredients, or those which are not combined in proper proportion or carefully mixed and which will leave either an acid or an alkali in the bread, must not be used.

It is well to sound a note of warning in this direction, or the change from the objectionable yeast to an impure baking powder will be a case of jumping from the frying pan into the fire.

The best baking powder made is, as shown by analysis, the "Royal." It contains absolutely nothing but cream of tartar and soda, refined to a chemical purity, which when combined under the influence of heat and moisture produce carbonic acid gas, and having done this, disappear. Its leavening strength has been found superior to other baking powders, and as far as I know, it is the only powder which will raise large bread perfectly. Its use avoids the long period during which the yeast-made dough must stand in order that the starch may ferment, and there is also no kneading necessary.

The two materials used in the Royal, cream of tartar and soda, are perfectly harmless, even when eaten. But they are combined in exact compensating weights, so that when chemical action begins between them they practially disappear, the substance of both having been taken up to form the carbonic acid gas. More than this, the proper method of using the powder insures the most thorough mixing with the flour. The proper quantity being taken, it is mixed with the flour and stirred around in it. The mixture is then sifted several times, and this insures that in every part of the flour there shall be a few particles of the powder. The salt and milk or water being added, the dough is made up as quickly as possible, and molded into the loaves.

These are placed in the oven and baked. But the very moment the warmth and moisture attack the mixture of cream of tartar and soda, these two ingredients chemically combine, and carbonic acid or leavening gas is evolved. The consequence may be seen at a glance; the bread is raised during the time it is baking in the oven, and this is the most perfect of all conceivable methods of raising it.



BREAD WITHOUT YEAST—"THE MOST PERFECT OF ALL CONCEIVABLE WAYS OF RAISING IT.

Here, then, there is no chance for germs of disease to get into the dough and thence into the stomach; more than that, the bread is necessarily as sweet as possible, there having been no time in which it could sour. This involves the fact that the bread so made will keep longer, as it is less likely to be contaminated by the germs that effect the souring process.

It will be strange if the crowds of visitors to the World's Fair do not greatly increase the number of contagious diseases, which we will have to treat. Under these circumstances is it not folly of follies to open a single channel through which these germs may reach us? Is it not the part of wisdom to watch with the greatest care all that we eat and drink, and to see that none but the safest and best methods are employed in the preparation of our food? To me it seems as though there could be but one answer to questions like these.

I have shown the danger of using the yeast-raised bread, and with this I have shown how that danger may be avoided. The ounce of prevention, which in this case is neither difficult nor expensive, is certainly worth many pounds of cure, and the best thing about it is that it may be relied on almost absolutely. Those who eat bread or biscuits or rolls made at home with Royal baking powder may be sure they have absolutely stopped one channel through which disease may reach them.

NOTE.—Housekeepers desiring information in regard to the preparation of the bread, which, for sanitary reasons, Dr. Edson so strongly urges for general use, should write to the Royal Baking Powder Company, New York.

As Good as a Seashore Cottage.

"Are you going to the seashore this summer?" Jones asked of Brown. "N-not exactly," said Brown, "but we're going to accomplish the same result without going from home at all." "What do you mean?" "Why, it's this way: You see, when a person of my means takes a cottage at the seashore he, of course, gets a poor sort of shanty, because we can't afford a large, finely finished and well-furnished house. You know the sort of place the usual summer cottage is. Well, we've decided to accomplish the result in another way. We're going to move up into the attic for the summer." "Move up into the attic?" "Why, certainly. It is unfinished, just like a seashore cottage. The sun beats down on the shingles and raises the temperature above 100 degrees every sunny summer day; that's just like a seashore cottage, too. When it rains the water doesn't beat through our roof, to be sure, as it does through the roofs of the seashore cottages, but we can remedy that by poking a few holes through the shingles here and there, and getting the roof mended in the fall. It will smell a little stuffy, but that is eminently like a seashore cottage. We shall keep a clothes basket full of unwashed clam shells standing in the corner to produce a realistic effect. On the whole we shall be ever so much more comfortable in our own accustomed garret than we would be at the seaside, and we shall have this inestimable advantage, that when we get sick of it we can simply move right down into our own comfortable home, whereas if we were at the shore and paying a high price for a cottage we should feel bound to stick it out to the bitter end. Oh, I tell you it is a great scheme!"—Boston Transcript.

An Amusing Derivation.

Lexicographers of other days were notoriously at fault with their derivations, and an amusing instance is given as to how plausible etymologies may be concocted. It appears that the learned Porson was staying at one time with a well known Canon of Ely named Jeremiah King. One day at dinner, when they had got into a discussion upon questions of etymology, Porson gave a derivation which King considered so far-fetched as to be quite ridiculous.

"You might as well say that my name is connected with cucumber," said King.

Possibly there was a cucumber on the dinner table.

"And so it is," said Porson.

"How so?" asked King.

"Why, thus—Jeremiah King, by contraction Jerry King; Jerry King, by contraction and metathesis, Gherkin; and gherkin, we know, is a cucumber pickled."

Porson's definition of the meaning of the word gherkin is almost as erroneous, it will be observed, as his playful derivation, since gherkin is not a pickled cucumber, but a small cucumber of a particular variety commonly used for pickling.

Wonderful Helen Keller.

Helen Keller, the wonderful deaf, dumb, and blind girl, who has been taught so much despite her triple affliction, has been visiting Prof. Graham Bell, in Washington. She has lately taken up the study of French, and already has a good knowledge of the language. In a letter to a friend she once wrote: "I am always delighted when any one writes me a beautiful thought which I can treasure in my memory forever. It is because my books are so full of the riches of which Mr. Ruskin speaks that I love them so dearly. I did not realize until I began to write the sketch what precious companions books have been to me, and how blessed even my life has been, and now I am happier than ever because I do realize the happiness that has come to me." This was written two years ago, when she was but 11 years old.

A Georgia Marriage Ceremony.

A justice of the peace in Sandersville, Ga., being called upon to perform a marriage ceremony, is accused of concluding with, "By the authority vested in me as an officer of the State of Georgia, which is sometimes called the Empire State of the South; by the fields of cotton that lie spread out in snowy whiteness around us; by the howl of the coon dog, and the gourd vine whose clinging tendrils will shade the entrance to your humble dwelling place; by the red and luscious heart of the watermelon whose sweetness fills the heart with joy; by the heavens and earth, in the presence of these witnesses, I pronounce you man and wife."

Pat's Wit Always on Tap.

A son of Erin was coming up-town on the evening of Decoration Day feeling much exhilarated. He sat in the street car exclaiming at short intervals and in various keys: "H'rah f'r oul' Irelan'." He said it when the conductor asked for his fare and he said it when someone asked him to move along and make room; he said it when he got off the car, and to the first man he met he shouted: "H'rah f'r oul' Irelan'." The man didn't sympathize with his mood, and answered surlily: "Hurrah for h—ll." The Irishman faced about and laid a detaining arm on the other man's shoulder. "Tha's jus' w'at I's 'bout t' remark," said he, confidentially; "ev'ry man f'r 's own country."—New York Times.

Blockaded by Bees.

A swarm of bees entered the cab of a locomotive at Huntington, Pa., drove the engineer and fireman out, and stopped travel on the road until the farmer owning the invaders appeared and effected their removal.

DUTY OF CONGRESS.

DEMOCRACY MUST REDEEM ITS PLEDGES.

Any Undemocratic Act Is Dangerous—Tariff and Finance Are the Questions Before the People—Digging Political Graves Deeper—Give Us Relief.

Democratic Responsibility.

Whatever is not Democratic is dangerous. Every Democratic voter has a share in the direction of the party; he bears his portion of the responsibility for what it does or leaves undone. Thus his personal interest and his pride of citizenship are enlisted. He has a regard for the consistent execution of laws he has helped to enact and for the redemption of platform pledges he has helped to make. Democracy is a body of highly trained political units. No professedly Democratic leader has been able to deceive his people. Other parties may obey leaders and applaud the act which belies the once applauded word. A real Democrat trusts the principles he has adopted and judges for himself whether they are followed or deserted. The Republican party can promise to reduce the tariff, and then raise it. Such a shameless violation of repeated pledges as that party committed in 1883 could not be imitated by a Democratic congress without an atonement which would consign to obscurity every guilty member. Each individual Democrat has in his memory and heart the historic struggle of his party against protective tariffs. Therefore the McKinley law must be replaced with a tariff based upon the general welfare principle of revenue; for the party is in power and pledges must be redeemed.

No act of the party which lately controlled the Government is more un-Democratic than the Sherman law. The party is unreservedly under pledge to repeal it, and to substitute a measure for the coinage of gold and silver without discriminating against either metal. Such are the words of the national platform of 1892, passed after the Democrats in every State convention had made the demand in language plain and well considered. For the Democratic party, in or out of power, nothing is safe which is not Democratic. To temporize with the McKinley tariff or to hesitate in suspending the operation of the Sherman act would be unsafe for a Democratic Congress. In principle, in detail, and in effect these two laws are against the thoroughly ingrained opinions of the Democratic masses. They were bought by special interests, and their design did not embrace consideration for the people. Both have disturbed trade and offended the natural laws of wealth. Both have brought losses upon the producers and consumers. Together they have contributed to create the uncertainty which has contracted the movement of capital and crushed hundreds of enterprises.

The tariff and money questions are not the accidents of the summer. The future of the whole American people enters into their settlement. The Democratic masses know the pledges of the party, because they voted upon pledges. How can the Democratic Congressmen face their people next year and endure the comparison of pledge with performance if they are capable of no better finance than a blind stand against suspending the purchase of bullion, and of no better taxation than a miserable, ineffectual, intimidated rehash of McKinleyism? These are considerations of import. The Democratic party has a history and a destiny. Its history is the story of its constitutional doctrine. Its destiny is the restoration of the spirit of the Constitution. If a Democratic Congress and a Democratic President can do no better than to put their bended backs under the Sherman and McKinley laws there will be one chapter which the Democrats of the next century will pass over in silence if they can. Whatever is not democratic is dangerous.—St. Louis Republic.

The Curse of Cheapness.

In 1890 the Republicans were telling us that "cheap coats make cheap men," that "cheap and nasty go together" and that "the cry for cheapness is un-American." From such statements it would naturally be inferred that goods would be cheaper under some other system than protection. The Republicans did not like effect of this cry against cheapness upon the election in 1890, and in 1892 they were prepared to tell us that protection lowers prices. The "tariff pictures" of the New York Press and of the American Economist were devoted to this idea for many months. The Senate Report on Prices was fixed up so that it was claimed that it showed this result—but it didn't. Well, the result of the election in 1892 was no more satisfactory than in 1890, and the Republicans have concluded that they might as well throw off their mask and tell the truth again. Hence they are everywhere asserting that the country is about to be ruined by the low prices which free trade will inaugurate. They say that it is because the country is afraid of itself on this point that we are now in the midst of a panic. Of course, by country they mean manufacturers. Hear what the New York Press of Aug. 2, now says:

> To obtain cheapness for commodities is the first and last purpose of the British policy of free trade which has been forced upon this country. To reach this end British agriculture has been deliberately sacrificed by the rulers of England. That commodities might be cheapened in the United States, many Americans went to the polls in November last and voted to overthrow that system of protection to home industry under which the workman earned vastly higher wages with which to purchase the slightly dearer coat. The result longed for by the Democratic voters and promised by Democratic journals and politicians has been speedily secured. Before Mr. Cleveland had been a month in office the era of cheapness had begun. A nation which was at the top notch of prosperity one year ago has been plunged into a condition of severe depression. Cheapness has come, but with it have come the compulsory idleness of thousands of men, the cessation of wage payments to great masses and consumers, the stagnation of trade and the substitution of apprehension, consternation and dismay for the buoyancy, cheerfulness and energetic movement of one year ago. The nation is having an object lesson from which it may learn by bitter experience the nature of the benefits that are offered by the cheapening of prices. Those benefits come solely to a few persons who are not producers of wealth.

This statement should convince the most skeptical that cheapness is a curse and that our only salvation lies in a return to protection and high prices. To make certain that we will miss none of the possible benefits of protection and that we will not be cursed by cheap oranges, lemons, bananas and other tropical fruits, let us put duties on these articles so high that all such products will be grown on our own soil. If hot houses are necessary to do this so much the better. Think of the business booms, the valuable home markets and the extra wages for American workingmen, to come from the building of several thousand acres of hot-houses—brick-yards, lumber-yards, glass factories, sash and door factories, carpenters, masons, glaziers and painters, would be more prosperous by such a law. This prosperity would spread and diffuse itself until it had extended to the humblest farmer in the sod-house on the prairie—for such are the blessings of protection and high prices. If then we could induce our inventors to reverse their processes and invent machines to make goods dearer, we would be on the verge of a millennium. It just now occurs to us, however, that we are still living under laws made by the great McKinley himself—laws which were to guarantee high wages and prosperity to all. Before we decide to outdo McKinley will the Press kindly inform us what has upset the workings of this beneficent plan at least one year in advance of its probable abolition? Was its hold on our industries so weak after thirty years of continual grip that it could be shaken by a look from the unregenerate free-trade Democrats? If this be so, might it not be well to intrust our prosperity to something less timid or fickle? Possibly also the Sherman Silver Act may have some connection with our present troubles. We might investigate a little in this direction before declaring that cheapness is an unmitigated curse.—Byron H. Holt.

Digging Political Graves Deeper.

Certain Republicans, not satisfied with the depth of their graves, are actively engaged in digging them deeper. The New York Press was among the first to agitate for deeper graves by renewing the assaults upon the intelligence of the American people which caused the upheavals of 1890 and 1892. It will be recalled that Republicans everywhere then asserted that tariffs are not taxes; that they lower prices; that the foreigner pays tariff taxes; that we can tax ourselves into prosperity with a protective tariff, and all such other nonsense. A few weeks ago the New York Press dug up the Republican corpse and began to kick it, and to shout in its ears that the jig was not yet up if it would only perambulate about the country telling the people that they were fools first and cowards last; that they were now scared at their own tariff declarations; that this fear is the cause of the present panic; that the Sherman silver law really has nothing to do with it; that it would exist without the Sherman law; and that blue ruin will stare us in the face after the law is repealed and until President Cleveland and the leaders of the Democratic party renounce all intention of disturbing the McKinley tariff act. The New York Tribune and other leading Republican papers had some doubts as to the advisability of attempting to "fool all of the people all of the time," but as it was the last straw it reluctantly clutched at it, and the most of the other Republican papers and men—not excepting ex-President Harrison—are now soberly telling us that the country is afraid of the Democrats and of free trade, and that this is the cause of the present financial stringency. Where will these same journals and men be when Congress has repealed the Sherman law—as it is almost certain to do—and the business of the country has returned to its usual prosperous condition? Will they have sufficient confidence in the credulity and stupidity of the American people to imagine that they can again be deceived by any false cry? Are not these Republicans burning their bridges behind them when they bet their last dollar that this is a free trade panic? What if the panic ceases the moment that the Sherman law is abolished, as Depew—the one rational Republican left—says it will? How much deeper will the country then find it necessary to bury the G. O. P. corpse for hygienic reasons? And what a sorry condition this same corpse will be in when the day of judgment arrives, and it must tell of the misery that was caused on earth by its shameful abuse of trust and confidence!

Give Us Relief First.

The preamble and resolutions reported by the Committee of the Silver Conference are precisely what might have been anticipated. In other words they state the views of the promoters of the convention, which have been expressed time and time again in the newspapers, in pamphlets, on the floor of Congress and on the stump. After stating as facts a large number of disputed propositions, especially the charge that the act of 1873 was a "secret demonetization" of silver, the resolutions insist that the Sherman act, while an objectionable device of the enemies of silver, shall not be repealed except by a measure restoring the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. It is asserted that the Government can keep silver at par with gold by its simple fiat. The experience of the country in endeavoring to do this by purchasing the equivalent of the entire product of American mines and issuing Treasury notes against it is not satisfactory to the advanced free-coinage men. Doubtless, however, there are many persons who believe in the employment of the two metals for money who are willing to grant the business interests of the country immediate relief and to consider hereafter and at leisure what may be done for a permanent remedy of its financial evils.—New York World.

Two Brands of Reformers.

One brand of tariff reformers think that protection is bad and that it should be abolished. They think, though, that as every change in the tariff unsettles business it is best not to shock trade by any great or sudden change of rates. They prefer to reform gently and to scale down protective duties at the rate of 2, 3, or 5 per cent. a year, reaching a tariff for revenue basis in 1905 or 1910. Another brand agrees that protection is a curse and that any change of duties disturbs industry. They think, however, the quicker the tariff can be reformed and protection abolished the quicker will be the recovery from the shock. If a tooth is bad they prefer to have it extracted at one sitting rather than at a dozen sittings, in which case the agony might be prolonged for two or three weeks. They say also that if protection is abolished piecemeal not only will business be panicky for many years but the protected manufacturers will fight each step with all their power, money, and influence.

Short, sharp action, which shall remove the poisonous fang of protection from industry, is what is needed. Business will then soon recover from the shock and will thrive as never before.

Will Benefit Us.

The American farmer is not to have the advantage of a European war, but there are evidences of a lively competition between Russia and Germany to see which can tax itself the more in order to spite the other. Germany imports a good deal of grain from Russia, and in order to retaliate on Russia for advancing duties on German manufactured goods, Germany is preparing to exclude Russian breadstuffs entirely and depend upon the United States. Already the United States has taken a large part of German trade from Russia. We can enjoy this tariff fight, knowing that, however hard it may be on the German and Russian consumer, it will inure to our benefit.

A GERMAN method of protecting iron and steel from rust consists of coating electrolytically with peroxide of lead. A suitable coating can be applied in twenty minutes, and the temper of the steel article is not affected.

The Busy Bee.

Every head of clover consists of about sixty flower tubes, each of which contains an infinitesimal quantity of sugar. Bees will often visit a hundred different heads of clover before retiring to the hive, and in order to obtain the sugar necessary for a load must therefore thrust their tongues into about six thousand different flowers. A bee will make about twenty trips a day, when the clover patch is convenient to the hive, and thus will draw the sugar from 120,000 different flowers in the course of a single day's work. Men think they have hard work to make a living, but their employment, however arduous, is an easy and pleasant task compared to that of a working bee.—Globe-Democrat.

A Hint to Rise.

The grave young man in ordinary black leather shoes was reading his Bible when the summer girl in white Eton jacket entered the car.

The young man's lips moved but he did not.

He pretended not to see.

Presently a look of pain flitted across his face.

"Excuse me," he growled "you are standing on my feet."

She smiled sweetly.

"I beg your pardon," she murmured, "but you did not seem to be using them yourself."

How He Got Sumner's Autograph.

A small boy once saw Charles Sumner's frank on a public document and, avaricious of autographs, straightway sat down and wrote to him, saying: "By the aid of Webster's unabridged, the Latin and Greek lexicons, and the assistance of my high school teacher, I have made it out to be your name. If that is so, and you can do it again, please do it for me." The Senator, amused by what flippant people in these days would call the gall of the youth, replied: "I am glad to learn that you have so many helps to education. It was my name. I can do it again, and here it is. Yours very truly, Charles Sumner."—New York Times.

The Violent Commotion

In the stomach and bowels produced by a violent purgative and its consequent drenching action, never are, because it is impossible they should be, followed by permanent good effects. No specific which weakens and convulses the organs for whose relief it is used can do good. Blue pills, calomel, podyphyllin, salts and senna, vegetable or mineral purgative pills, are drastic remedies generally void of benefit. A reliable and effective substitute for them is Hostetter's Stomach Bitters, which effects a change both natural and thorough in the bowels when they are constipated. A sufficient and regular secretion of bile by the liver and sound digestion are also promoted by its use. Malaria in all its forms, rheumatism and kidney trouble are obviated by this fine reformer of disordered conditions of the system. A wineglassful three times a day is about the dose.

"The Red, White, and Blue."

The music and the words of the song "Red, White, and Blue" originated in Great Britian, and the words were but slightly altered in the attempt to adapt it to the United States. During the Crimean war the song was sung in the theaters, music halls, and on the streets all over the British empire, wherever the red, white, and blue flag was flying, whether in Europe, Asia, Africa, America, or Australia.

For all diseases that depend on the liver or the blood—Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Biliousness; every form of Scrofula, even Consumption (or Lung-scrofula) in its earlier stages; and the most stubborn Skin and Scalp Diseases, the "Discovery" is the only remedy so unfailing and effective that it can be guaranteed.

If it doesn't benefit or cure, you have your money back.

GUNS AT THE BIG FAIR

TOOLS OF WAR ONE OF THE MOST POPULAR EXHIBITS.

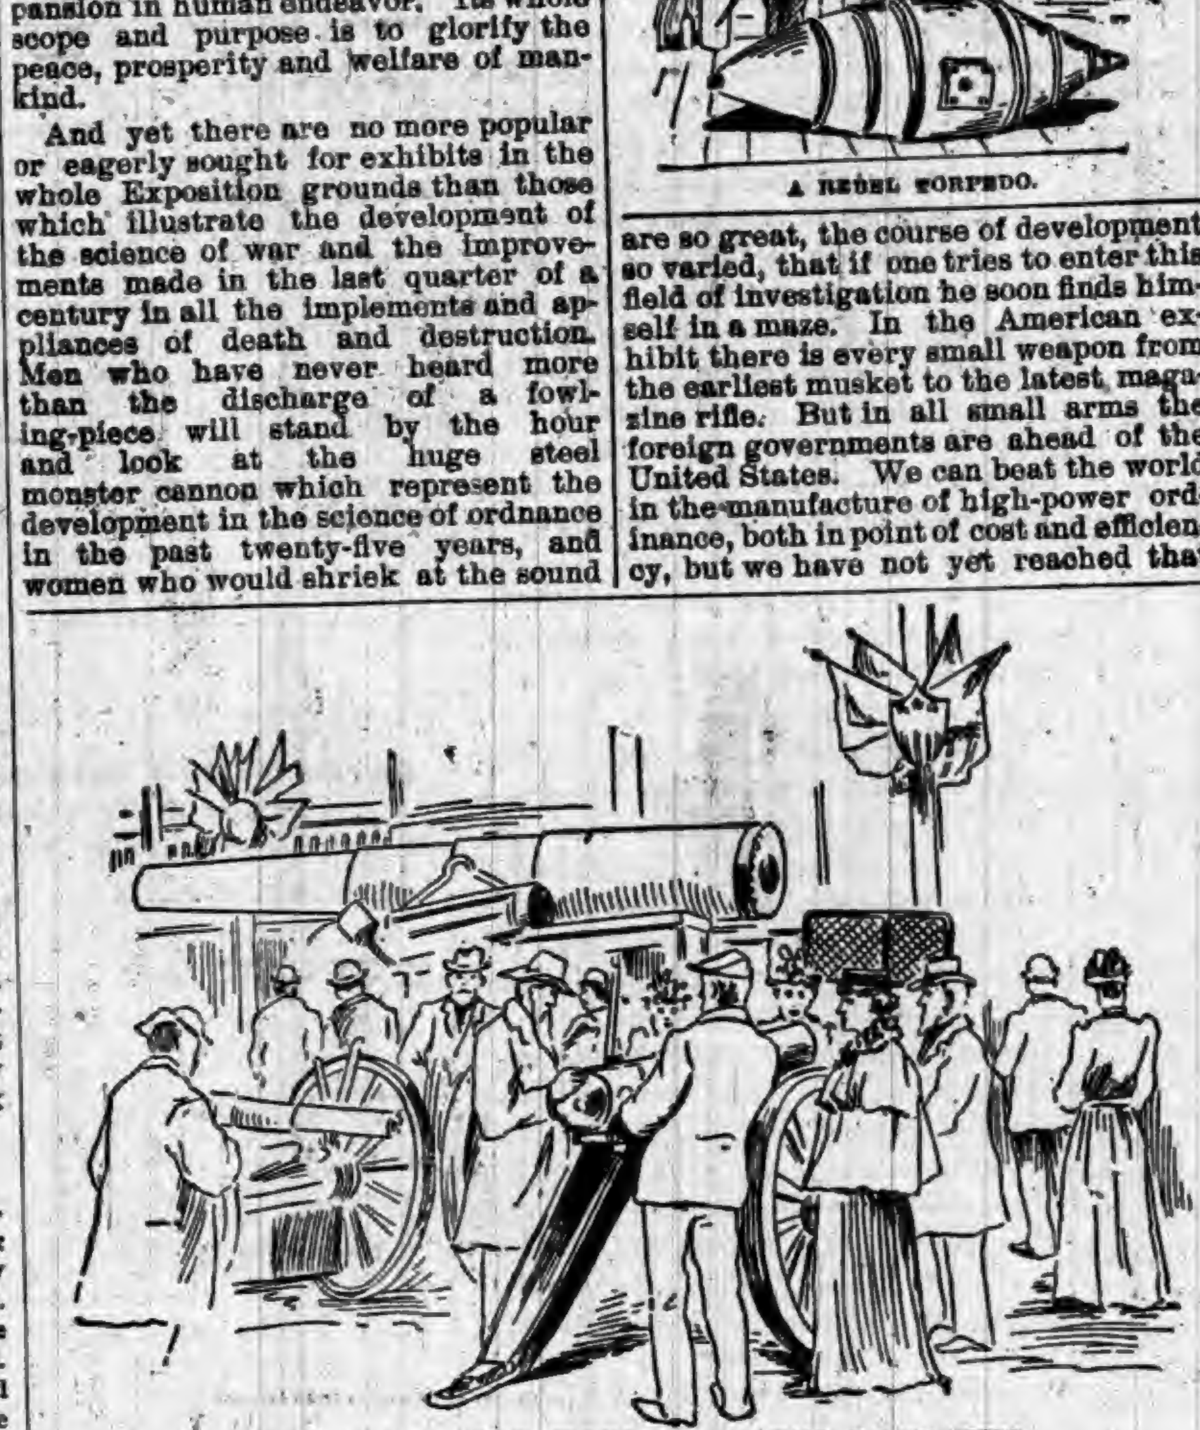
Even Apostles of Peace Feast Their Eyes on the Terrible Krupp Gun—Great Progress in American Ordnance—We Are Behind in Small Arms.

They Catch the Crowd.

World's Fair correspondence:

The great Exposition was conceived and is being carried forward with a view to show the development of the world's inhabitants in the arts of peace. It is essentially an exposition of the industries, the arts and literature, the mechanics and all other fields of expansion in human endeavor. Its whole scope and purpose is to glorify the peace, prosperity and welfare of mankind.

And yet there are no more popular or eagerly sought for exhibits in the whole Exposition grounds than those which illustrate the development of the science of war and the improvements made in the last quarter of a century in all the implements and appliances of death and destruction. Men who have never heard more than the discharge of a fowling-piece will stand by the hour and look at the huge steel monster cannon which represent the development in the science of ordnance in the past twenty-five years, and women who would shriek at the sound of a pistol will peer curiously into the muzzles of these monsters and with a shudder turn away. All these people are apostles of peace, yet their keenest appreciation and greatest curiosity is expended upon implements of war. It is a strange paradox, but it is eminently characteristic of the race. We are born of a fighting race of people, of battle-giving fathers and of enthusiastic flag-waving mothers, and the human instinct so inspired is not to be suppressed by simple emblems of peace and prosperity. If we have no opportunity to fight we like to look at the things people do fight with when they get a chance, and hence it is that the war department exhibition in the Government Building, the battle ship containing the naval exhibit, the German and French ordnance exhibits in the Manufactures Building, the English naval models and the rapid-fire ordnance which they exhibit in the Transportation Building, the Spanish, Italian and Austrian military exhibits, and finally the great Krupp gun pavilion, are to thousands of people the chief points of interest on the Fair grounds.



EXPLAINING THE WORKING OF THE HOTCHKISS

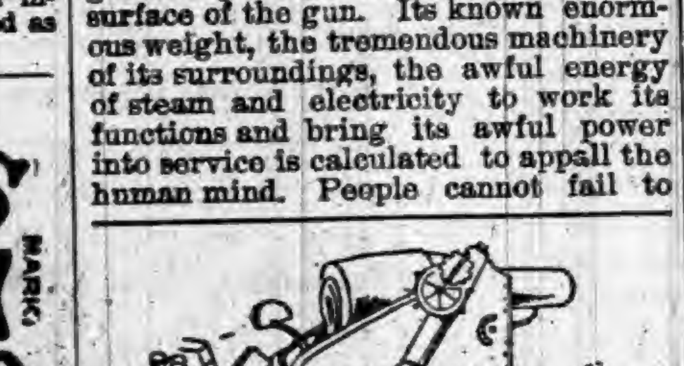
THE OLD AND THE NEW.

Throws a Ton Twelve Miles.

Naturally the American exhibit is the most complete, though the Krupp exhibit is the most startling to the plain untutored child of the prairie. The human mind can conceive of 10-inch guns, 200-pound projectiles, armor plates of twelve inches in thickness and all those simple things of warfare, but when it comes to a gun which requires 500 pounds of powder, which carries a projectile which weighs a ton from ten to twelve miles, that is an instrument which makes the mouth open involuntarily. The Krupp gun does that; The spectacle of the big gun, which weighs 124 tons, with its massive and complicated carriage or mount, as it is called, is really great. One stands at the base and looks upward at an angle of 45 degrees to get sight even of the under surface of the gun. Its known enormous weight, the tremendous machinery of its surroundings, the awful energy of steam and electricity to work its functions and bring its awful power into service is calculated to appall the human mind. People cannot fail to wonder what would be the effect of the explosion of 500 pounds of the new high-power powder, the instantaneous propulsion of a ton of metal starting on its journey of twelve miles, and, wondering, they almost involuntarily shudder and clap their hands to their ears.



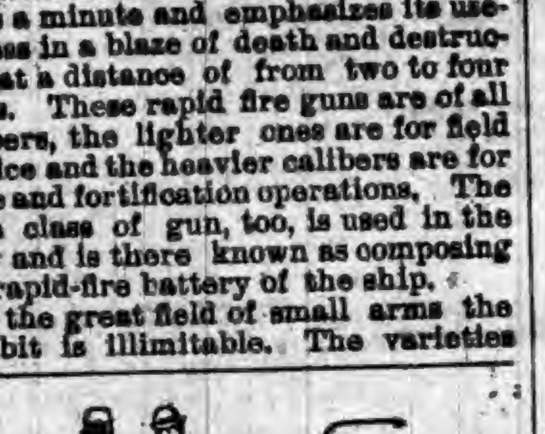
A MODERN MORTAR.

The biggest gun in the American exhibit is the 12-inch breech-loading loading rifle made at the Watervliet arsenal for coast defense. This gun is not mounted for the reason that no carriage has yet been made for it, but it has tremendous interest for the crowds at the Fair. The people gaze at it, they crowd about it, they pat it with their gloved hands, they study its intricate machinery and then they turn away with gratified looks, take a glance or two at the stars and stripes and mentally observe, "Let Uncle Sam's enemies come on, and let them come all at once."

Old and New Death Dealers.

Those in charge of the military exhibit made a happy hit when they placed side by side an ordinary six-pound brass cannon, used in the Mexican war, and a modern thirty-two-pounder rapid fire gun of the Hotchkiss type. The old Mexican war gun could throw a shot about 1,200 feet and could be fired once in five minutes if its crew was active. The new thirty-two-pounder Hotchkiss fires thirty shots a minute and emphasizes its usefulness in a blaze of death and destruction at a distance of from two to four miles. These rapid fire guns are of all calibers, the lighter ones are for field service and the heavier calibers are for siege and fortification operations. The same class of gun, too, is used in the navy and is there known as composing the rapid-fire battery of the ship.

In the great field of small arms the exhibit is illimitable. The varieties are so great, the course of development so varied, that if one tries to enter this field of investigation he soon finds himself in a maze. In the American exhibit there is every small weapon from the earliest musket to the latest magazine rifle. But in all small arms the foreign governments are ahead of the United States. We can beat the world in the manufacture of high-power ordinance, both in point of cost and efficiency, but we have not yet reached that stage when we can arm an individual soldier as can most of the countries of Europe. We have a better display of rapid-fire guns for field and shipboard service than any or all of the countries of Europe combined. We have a more notable torpedo exhibit than any European country, and when it comes to the manning of ships in war and the equipment of swift cruisers, we are away ahead of anybody. The battle ship alone is a wonderful study and impresses even the most experienced of naval and military men.



A REBEL TORPEDO.

In the matter of military equipment for troops in the field there is less progress shown by far. From models exhibited in the Federal Building there is no apparent change in methods of transportation and methods in the quartermaster's and commissary departments. Nor is there any great change in the military system on the tented field. The soldier's tent is the same old canvas tent. The litter which carries him from the field is the same old litter. The canteen which he fills at the muddy stream is the same old canteen. The kettle in which he makes his coffee and the oven in which he bakes his bread are the same old kettle and the same old oven. They may make guns which carry twelve miles and use 500 pounds of powder, but they have never yet made a camp-kettle that will turn chicory and rye into coffee and plaster beans into palatable food, and so when the private soldier visiting the Exposition gazes upon the enormous progress made in the implements of destruction, he cannot be blamed for marveling as he does why something more has not been done for the protection of the soldier's health and comfort and the general welfare of his stomach.

It is alleged that jealousy of rival physicians caused his conviction, and that he was not guilty. He was convicted about a month ago.

UNLESS there is a rise in the price of wheat much of it in Grant County will be fed to hogs. It is much richer than corn, but is ground and soaked before it is fed. Among those who will use for that purpose is Recorder Rybolt, a young and progressive farmer. Wheat ground and mixed with corn in equal parts he declares to be the best feed that can be used. He also mixes the wheat with boiled potatoes. Wheat gives the bone and muscle while corn produces fat. Many other farmers will store their wheat and use it for feed unless there is a rise in the price.

The buggy was afterwards dashed to pieces, and both ladies badly injured. The babe was found lying in the street, and had suffered but little injury.

HEN HALLUCINATIONS.

Chickens Who Die Cackling About the Eggs They Do Not Lay.

Queer things come into newspaper offices both on legs and on paper, says the Cleveland Leader. The appended disquisition is offered as a sample of the latter. It came from an occasion contributor who has more than once proved that he has a remarkably keen eye for eccentricities in the animal kingdom. His latest contribution to natural science, which he calls "Chicken Hallucinations," is as follows:

"A very peculiar phase of chicken mental phenomena was shown me today. I visited by request some farms east of Ashland, Ohio, and on approaching the farm barnyard and poultry house heard a chorus of chickens cackling that was composed of both hens and roosters, cackling as if they had laid double-yelk eggs apiece, but many had been cackling so long that they were voicing a dying cackle, and many had died in the continuous effort to cackle externally, and their ghosts seem to cackle, for they were stiff in death and in a cackling attitude. It seems to be a disease that is peculiar to chickens and very contagious. They cackle violently all day and go to roost at night still cackling, and then cackle all night long, and so continue the next day as long as they are able to make a noise, and their last cackling is so sepulchral and so modulated by weakness and death that the dead ones make a refrain that will never leave my ears. They live from twenty-four to thirty-six hours, according to the strength of the chicken and the violence of its ecstatic emotions. They appear to die in an old-fashioned campmeeting trance and I expect to see the seemingly dead ones come to life and cackle what they had seen and felt in their trance, but I left before they came out of their hynotic state, if it was, not death. Their combs became extremely red, as those of laying hens always do. They never seem to sing; it is always a cackle, an overpowering hallucination, acting as if they had just laid an egg; and like old hunters and old soldiers and all love-feast sisters, they never tire of telling what they have done and seen. They seem to want to die a-shouting and a cackling about the egg they have never laid.

"This is correct—no exaggeration; one farmer has lost of a large flock about half.

Unruly Members.

A recent life of Peter Stuyvesant describes some of the social phases of New York at the time when it was New Amsterdam. A rigid dignity of behavior was enjoined upon the citizens, and enforced by a multiplicity of fines.

The magistrates were treated with great respect by the people, and were generally addressed as "Most worshipful lords." They evidently had no official titles, and when Stuyvesant addressed them he adopted that form which best suited his humor.

In announcing a fast day, he directed his letter to "The Most Worshipful, Most Prudent and very Discreet, their High Mightinesses, the Burgomasters and Schepens of Nieuw Amsterdam." But when a quarrel had arisen on the propriety of a game called "Riding the Goose," he addressed his angry reproofs to "The Small Bench of Justices."

It was dangerous in those days to indulge in idle words. One Pieter Pietersen Smit called Joghem Beeckman a "black pudding beast." Both were fined as slanderers.

Solomonla Chair, having lost his temper and been fined for an epithet applied to the fire inspectors, paid the fine, but with the contemptuous remark.

"Is it to have a little cock booted and spurred that I am to give it?"

This remark was reported, and the court imposed an additional fine of twelve guilders on the ground that "it is not seemly that man should mock and scoff at persons appointed to any office."

The house of Pietertje Jans was sold on an execution for debt, and she declared in public to the officers of the court:

"Ye despoilers! Ye bloodsuckers! Ye have not sold, but given away my house!"

The officers declared that such words were "a sting that cannot be endured," and Pietertje was brought before the magistrate and forbidden "to indulge in such blasphemies in the future, or by neglect the judge shall hereafter provide for it."—Youth's Companion.

Heart, or Liver?

Martin F. Tupper was at one time immensely popular, both in England and America. Grace Greenwood says of his poetry that it was a "brief though furious fashion," and she goes on to illustrate his British inability to take an American joke by a story of his mystification by Senator "Tom" Corwin.

One evening the two sat together at a public dinner, and Mr. Corwin proceeded to discourse on the divine art of poetry, in a manner delightfully absurd but rather puzzling to a poet.

"Why, Mr. Tupper," he asked, "do you poets always make the heart the seat of love? Now I should locate that passion in quite another organ—the liver!"

"Why, bless my soul, Mr. Corwin, you're not speaking seriously!"

"Perfectly, my dear sir! For example, when a young man is in love, his heart is seldom affected but his liver always is. He loses his appetite; if there are obstacles, he peaks and pines. You surely have observed it! Now you poets ought to let the heart alone, and deal with the liver. I would even have changes made in the old poems, in accordance with physiological truth."

"But, my dear sir, what about the rhyme and the rhythm?"

"Oh, those little things could be arranged. For instance, take the first two lines of Byron's Maid of Athens:

> Maid of Athens, ere we part
> Give, oh give me back my heart!

Now how simple the change and how satisfactory:

> Maid of Athens, ere we sever,
> Give, oh give me back my liver!"

SOMEHOW people feel sorrier for a bride whose husband has a long beard, than for one whose husband has a smooth face.

Curiosities of the Wild Fig Tree.

The wild fig tree is found at various points along the southern coast, being entirely tropical, and most every island in the Everglades contains more or less of them. This is a remarkable tree. It first makes its appearance as the creeper and seizes on the largest tree it can find, continuing to encircle it in its meshes until it deprives it of life, when it feeds upon the decayed matter and becomes a beautiful tree. On one of the islands in the Everglades during Gen. Harney's operations, two of these large, wild fig trees were discovered, standing about ten feet apart, which decorated the center of the island. They had each attacked a palmetto and one of them was dead, but the top of the other was still blooming in the center, although completely surrounded. The Indian name of the wild fig tree is "ho-co-moth-locco."—St. Augustine News.

A New Aneroid.

Edward Whymper, the well-known authority on mountain climbing, has introduced a new form of aneroid, designed especially for use in mountain travel or for æronauts. This form of mountain aneroid is intended to avoid the inaccuracies which result from continued exposure to low atmospheric pressure. It is inclosed in a perfectly air-tight outer case and the internal atmosphere is kept at about a normal pressure at all times, except when an observation is to be taken. The cock is then opened and communication with the external atmosphere is established. After the reading is taken the pressure is restored to the normal by means of a small force-pump. The conditions thus correspond to those which originally obtained when the aneroid was graduated under the air-pump receiver.

Accommodation Notes.

When the maker of a note receives no consideration for which he promises the payment in the note, but makes it simply to lend his credit to the payee, so that said payee may raise money on the maker's name, then it is an accommodation note. He who is so accommodated cannot recover the money promised by the maker. If, however, the note be indorsed over to a third party "for value received," then the maker is holden to the third party, even though the nature of the note was known by said third party when he received the note.

A Human Alarm Clock.

In the archives of the Protestant Church of Harlem can be seen a document from the seventeenth century, which designates that in the year 1625 a certain Hans Zink was engaged for fifteen stivers per week, to wake up all those in the congregation of that church, that went to sleep during the sermon. Zink held the office to the satisfaction of his superiors for twenty years, but was dismissed at the end of that time, because he himself was caught napping several times while preaching was going on.

The most learned physicians made examinations and pronounced my case one of Gravel or Stone in the Bladder, and said that I would never be any better until it was removed by a surgical operation. Oh! I send you by this same mail a sample of the stone or gravel that was dissolved and expelled by the use of your SWAMP-ROOT. It must have been as large as a good sized goose egg. I can cure any case of piles, no matter of how long standing, or how hopeless the case may be. The patient suffers no pain or inconvenience. In most cases one treatment is sufficient, which takes only a few minutes, and the time required for a cure is about two weeks, during which time the patient is not inconvenienced from business. 20tf

Mrs. Henry Willis went to Chicago last week. Craig Day and wife and Mrs. Lockhart have gone this week.

Master Leon Locke came by himself on the cars from Decatur last week to stay a month or so. He yet yearns for his old home and companions.

Burglars broke into the express office Sunday night and forced open the outer doors of the safe, but were either frightened away or for some reason left without taking anything.

The second windmill at the town well at the corner of Wayne and Railroad streets is being taken down by workmen, and we hear the city fathers have concluded to put in a pump and allow each one to pump for himself. This is no doubt a wise decision, in the light of the past. The regret is the experience has cost so dear.

Saturday evening, the stock in the people's store, having been invoiced, was opened to the public at reduced prices, and the salesmen were kept busy. Many ladies went to the store Monday to make purchases, but were not admitted as the goods were being packed to Butler where they were probably all sold. One person was heard to say, "The goods are so much prettier than they have been before."

Ed. Leighty and wife have three in the family now. Mrs. L. was at Ft. Wayne last week and purchased a pug pup. Ed. is now second rate.

Miss Lydia Case's funeral was held in the Lutheran church Saturday afternoon Rev. Thomas officiating, and the remains were interred in the Spencerville cemetery. It will be remembered that Miss Case was so frightfully burned a few weeks ago.

Saturday last was picnic day at Mt. Pleasant. Eight schools gathered in the grove furnished by Mr. Ginder, and the Mt. Pleasant people proved themselves excellent entertainers. One noticeable feature was the reciting of the Lord's prayer in the mute language by young McCullough, it was slightly exciting yet so gracefully rendered that he held the crowd spell-bound.

John Robinson's Great World's Exposition.

"The Half Has Not Been Told Me."

The memorable expression of the Queen of Sheba on viewing the pomp and glories of King Solomon's court can with verity be used in speaking of the transcendent splendors of the gorgeous biblical spectacle, Solomon, his Temple, and the Queen of Sheba, which the management of the Robinson show produce this year on a scale of unexampled magnitude and splendor. No spectacle ever presented to the public can vie with it in rich sceneographic effect; in faithful and characteristic portraitures of the people, manners and customs during the reign of Israel's wisest king; in pomp, in pageantry and in parade; in sacred sacrificial offerings; in lovely women; in enchanting ballets; in fiercely contested and exciting chariot races, and in the luxurious opulence of its costuming and appointments. Taken from the grandest scenes of the patriarchal era, it can not only interest the biblical scholar, but the moral, the cultured and the refined, seeking after intellectual and mind improving entertainment, will find in this an exhibition well worthy their attention. Let it be understood, however, that this desirable augmentation is but one of the multitude of attractions to which the Robinson show invites the patronage of the public. Their circus has long been characterized as the most inviting in its unexceptional features and in the general excellence and proficiency of its ring performances of any traveling, while their menagerie is large and comprehensive, and includes living specimens of the rarest beasts, birds, reptiles and amphibia. Their colossal Roman hippodrome is in itself a feature that has no duplication, and carries the spectator back to imperial Cæsar's days. In mentioning the enjoyment, surprises and delights of this peerless exhibition it must not be forgotten to mention that for the special delectation of juvenile patrons the ever-delightful and mirth-provoking pantomime of Humpty-Dumpty, his Fortunes, Misfortunes and Mishaps, will find prominent place on the program. The show will exhibit in Auburn, Friday, August 25.

Worthington's Magazine.

Worthington's Illustrated Magazine for August opens with the second of the interesting papers entitled, "Random Notes on Hawaiian Life," written by C. T. Rodgers, M. D., a prominent physician, now and for many years a resident of Honolulu. The article treats of the native feasts; of Honolulu's picturesque mountain backgrounds, with a description of the Pali and the superb view from its summit; of beautiful Waikiki, "the Long Branch of Honolulu;" of the fern and shell and wild animal hunting of Hawaiian youths, and furnishes a very graphic account of life and work upon the great sugar plantations, from the planting of the cane to the granulating of the sugar. The third paper will treat of Mauna Loa with its lonely crater dome rising nearly 14,000 feet, and of Kilauea, "the volcano," where nature's fires are never extinguished. The illustrations from special photographs are noticeable for their beauty and artistic reproduction, addding greatly to the enjoyment of the article. Mrs. Livermore's eighth paper of personal experience "In 'Old Virginny'—Fifty Years Ago," is, like all the others, vivid in its portrayal of family life upon a remote plantation. From first to last this record is full of interest and will amply repay the reading of old and young in all classes of society. "Mental Characteristics of the Japanese," by Walter Dening, is a thoughtful paper upon a people who excite in the minds of intelligent observers a curiosity which the superficial remarks of mere travelers fail to satisfy. The opinions expressed are the result of eigeteen years study of Japan and the Japanese, of extensive travels in the country, and of social intercourse with all ranks and classes of Japanese society: the paper therefore has a weight and value far more authoritative than hastily written sketches of passing impressions and partial judgment.

CHICAGO AND THE FAIR.

My second visit to the fair has been one of greater leisure than that of May last. The fair in the meantime has under gone many changes, some for the better, others not so favorable. In my May visit one admission carried me into about all the shows on the Midway, except their inner temples. Now, entrance to about all of their outer parts is barred by the ubiquitous card, "Admission 25 cents." You pay the 25 cents and start around among the naked savages, but your sight seeing is soon rudely brought to a standstill by a demand for another fee to see what you have entered the unsavory place to feast your eyes upon, and you either have to pay twice or lose the object of your search. I found this true in nearly every place I entered in the Midway. The sights to be looked upon in this mile of shows, are varied and in many cases highly interesting. The Moorish Palace calls forth about as many expressions of praise as any thing in or out of the Plaisance. The particular attractions of this place are the bottomless well, the devil's cave, the maize, and the room of deception. You reach this room by a narrow stairway and your first glance before entering, is an empty space of unknown extent, as you advance into the room you are suddenly surrouned on all sides by an innumerable host, and upon a more careful survey, you find the multitute that fills the place as far as you can see, are all reflections of yourself in every attitude imaginable, and every movement of hand foot or arm is repeated by the great army that confronts you. Leaving Midway, with hundreds of attractions unseen, you enter the grounds proper, and proceed to a survey of the mighty gathering of the useful and curious things of this world and are soon, so confused with the marvelous display that you almost long for green fields and shady woods where you can shut your eyes in peace.

The attendance this week has been a trifle better than when I visited the place in May, but complaint is rife every where that the people do not come to see the Fair in any such numbers, as all had anticipated. Scatter 80,000 or 90,000 people (about the number in attendance the past two weeks) over the immense grounds and buildings and only a scattered few are any where visible, and bankruptcy for many individuals and a large unpaid debt for the Fair to assume are the unpleasant things feared, unless the attendance is greatly increased during the remaining months of the Fair. So far as the Fair proper is concerned it is every thing that can be hoped for. The exhibits are so numerous and varied that one could spend months and not exhaust the sources of information to the mind nor the luxury of sights to the eye; but like all things, the mind refuses to retain impressions and the eye tires with sights and we seek the shady seat beneath some tree, or behind some building and rest. Leaving the Fair at Cottage Grove gate we come out on Stony Island Avenue and 56th street. Here is a long line of World's Fair buildings of every class, from a one story booth to a six or eight story brick, but nearly every one is empty, with a conspicuous card, "To Rent" pasted in the window. Following these streets out, and on down Cottage Grove, empty buildings are plenty on all sides. Prerarations on so vast a scale had been made, and so few have come to the Fair that ruin has overtaken thousands who have invested in these undertakings. The city proper suffers the least, no expensive preparation has been necessary, and the tide of travel naturaly seeks the down town district, where accommodations are about as cheap as anywhere else; so the suburban residents wait in vain for the rush of moneyed visitors. Tired of dust and heat, I concluded to spend a day or two in the peach belt; so I took the Charles McVea, a trim little steamer, on Saturday evening and crossed the raging waters of Lake Michigan. The wind, which kept up a moderate breeze during the day, increased to a gale as we left our anchorage at O'Connor's Dock, and our little vessel began to prance around quite lively before we cleared the breakwater. This being my maiden trip, I naturally expected seasickness, and felt not a little concerned over the outcome of the venture, but put on a bold determination and went on board. It soon became impossible to stand or walk on the boat, and I hastily sought my state room and held fast to my unwilling supper. Soon the gurgling sound of the effects of seasickness was heard from many of the state rooms. The plunging and rolling of the vessel soon rendered my efforts to retain my supper futile. The nausea soon passed off, but the racket of the passengers and the rolling of the boat drove sleep from my thoughts and I lay awake about all night listening to the roar and splash of the waves that seemed to almost engulf the little vessel. I reached Piercove about seven o'clock in the morning, about three hours late. A tiresome walk of two and a half miles of sand brought me to the home of my friends, where a good sleep and refreshments soon restored me to a normal condition. The peach crop is quite a good one. The early varieties are already ripe and one soon tires of their lusciousness after seeing them on every side in luxurious abundance. The quality is a little inferior and sales are made at very moderate prices. Returning, I came back on the new and swift sailing steamer Kalamazoo. The night was mild and a smooth sea made the trip a delightful one. Spent Tuesday at the fair and in the city and returned over the Lake Shore by way of Hillsdale and Angola, well satisfied with the trip and the enjoyments it afforded. J. A. C

GRAND ISLAND, NEB., April 8th, 1892.

Dr. Miles Medical Co., Elkhart, Ind.

GENTLEMEN: I had been troubled with HEART DISEASE FOR THE LAST 30 YEARS, and although I was treated by able physicians and tried many remedies, I grew steadily worse until I WAS COMPLETELY PROSTRATED AND CONFINED TO MY BED WITHOUT ANY HOPE OF RECOVERY. I would have very bad sinking spells, when my pulse would stop beating altogether, and it was with the greatest difficulty that my circulation could be started, which would bring me back to consciousness again. While in this condition I tried your NEW HEART CURE, and began to improve from the first, and now I am able to do a good day's work for a man 68 years of age. I give DR. MILES' NEW HEART CURE all the credit for my recovery. It is over six months since I have taken any, although I keep a bottle in the house in case I should need it. I have also used your NERVE AND LIVER PILLS, and think a great deal of them. Z. AVERY.

AUBURN AND VICINITY.

Some Remiaiscences of Its Early Days and Pioneer Citizens.

1872—Continued.

Improvements in the central and commercial portion of the town were being made on an extended scale for the locality. The old hotel long known as the Weaver house was being moved temporarily a short distance westward on the lot to vacate a site for a proposed brick hotel to be built by S. C. Swineford. Dr Cowan was greatly improving the present Caruth place and W. McIntyre attracted attention to the west central portion of the town by building two residence houses on Van Buren street.

The time had come when some portion of the lots on Seventh street opposite the public square were to be occupied by permanent buildings and the history of the attempt and final success is illustrative of American pluck under circumstances of unusual severity. The old two-story frame long in use was moved east and across the street from the Eagle Mills, where it still stands, being the Knoder blacksmith shop, and a brick block was planned which was to be three stories high, 110 feet front and 80 feet deep, to stand just west of the M. E. church.

H. E. Altenberg & Co. had the contract for the east 22 feet, to be built by Auburn Lodge No. 116, I. O. O. F. George Ensley was to erect a double store building of sixty-six feet front, and the remaining twenty-two feet fell to David Snyder, a young man of business push who had purchased for the purpose this part of the block site.
